 Hon. DANIEL CLARK, President pro tempore, a quorum of Senators being present, called the Senate to order at twelve o'clock, m.
 Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented the credentials of Hon. NATHAN A. FARWELL, appointed a Senator of the United States by the Governor of the State of Maine, to fill, until the next session of the Legislature of that State, the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. William Pitt Fessenden.

The credentials were read, and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. FARWELL, and he took his seat in the Senate.

HOOR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock, m., until otherwise ordered.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

EDWARD McPHERSON, Esq., Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have been directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

The House has passed a resolution directing the appointment of a committee on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and has appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON of Ohio, and Mr. REUBEN E. FENTON of New York, the committee on the part of the House.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members, be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. FOOT, CONNESS, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 350) to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 351) for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the militia of the States of Kansas and Missouri, in repelling the late invasion of those States by the rebel forces under General Sterling Price, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. FOSTER, (at thirty-five minutes past twelve o'clock.) I move that the Senate take a recess until half past one o'clock.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut if he expects the President's message to come in to-day. If he does, it would be very well to take the recess; but if the message is not coming in until to-morrow we may as well adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose no answer can be given until the committee return. I think it would be proper for us to be in session in order to receive the report of the committee, who will be back within an hour, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore again took the chair at half past one o'clock.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 5, 1864.

In conformity to the Constitution the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States of America convened this day in its second session. At twelve o'clock, m., Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a member from the State of Indiana, called the House to order.

Rev. W. H. CHANNING, the Chaplain, then offered up prayer in these words:

Lord God omnipotent, Creator of the universe, Father of spirits, pour Thy blessing upon us, for we seek to enter Thy presence with praise and thanksgiving. O Giver of all good gifts, thanks for the bountiful mercies that were poured abroad through all the loyal States of this Union since last we assembled in these Halls. Thanks for health within our habitations and prosperity within our borders. Thanks for the rich profits of the harvest-fields and orchards, for workshops resounding with the cheerful notes of industry, and for wealth flowing free into the marts of commerce. Thanks that Thou hast enabled the nation to preserve peace with other nations, to establish the public dignity and honor of this free Republic, and for the proof which Thou hast given of the singleness of the will of this people to preserve its institutions in perpetuity. Thanks that Thou hast guarded our cities and our villages from destructive raids and invasion, from the torch of the incendiary, from the passions let loose by domestic traitors. Thanks that Thou hast been with our armies and navies, and crowned their heroic efforts with triumph. Thanks for the nation's life preserved, replenished, full of vital vigor to-day.

And now, O Giver of all good gifts, we implore Thy presence and the fullness of Thy blessing upon our beloved nation. Be with our soldiers be with our sailors everywhere they are under Thy providence seeking to guard our frontiers. Penetrate and encircle the rebellion and manifest the indomitable power of a free people trusting in Thy providence to restore and save to the uttermost.

Be, we pray Thee, with Thy servants here gathered in both Houses of legislation. Replenish them with wisdom from on high that they may crown a work so well begun by restoring this nation's life in purifying the bond of our constitutional Union from those seeds of death which have so long corrupted it and hindered its full free growth to symmetric power.

Be, we pray Thee, with him whom Thou hast, acting through the people's will, once more summoned to exercise the executive power of this nation; that, reinvigorated and re-inspired by these marks of confidence, he and his Cabinet may press straight onward to the grand duty that Thou hast imposed, the reestablishment of liberty and law throughout the domains of the Republic intrusted by Providence to our ancestors.

O Thou who hast, through Thy beloved Son, promised to all upon earth the kingdom of heaven, come down, Ancient of days, reign over us, hear us for Thy mercy's sake. Amen.

During the call,

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleagues, Messrs. RANDALL and THAYER, were paired.

The SPEAKER stated that one hundred and twenty members had answered to their names—more than a quorum—and that the House was ready to proceed to the transaction of business.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that a quorum of that body had assembled, and was ready to proceed with the business of the session.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. WASHBURNE of Illinois, PENDLETON, and FENTON as such committee on the part of the House.

NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. ODELL announced that Hon. DWIGHT TOWNSEND, a member-elect from the first district of New York, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Henry G. Stebbins, was present, and desired to be sworn in.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented himself at the Speaker's desk, and was sworn in.

Mr. PEREA announced that Hon. CHARLES D. POSTON, Delegate-elect from the Territory of Arizona, was present, and desired to be sworn in.

Mr. POSTON presented himself at the Speaker's desk, and was sworn in.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the credentials of W. D. MANN, T. M. WELLS, ROBERT W. TALIAFERRO, A. P. FIELD, and M. F. BONZANO, claiming seats as Representatives from the State of Louisiana, which were read and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I now offer the customary resolution, that the gentlemen claiming seats as members from Louisiana be entitled to occupy seats upon the floor, and to speak to the merits of their claim to seats in this body. It is the ordinary resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution so as to provide that they shall be entitled to the privileges of the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Such claimants have always been permitted to occupy seats and speak to the merits of the questions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to modify the resolution by inserting the words "when the report shall be made from the Committee of Elections."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move, as a substitute for both propositions, that those gentlemen be granted the privileges of the Hall.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my amendment.
Mr. DAWES. I accept the substitute, and ask a vote on it.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

LAWS OF THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the laws of the Territories of Washington, Nevada, and Nebraska; which were severally referred to the Committee on Territories.

BILLS ON LEAVE, ETC.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next order of business, to call the States for bills on leave. No bills being offered, the States were next called for resolutions.

DRAWING SEATS.

Mr. ELIOT introduced the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House do now place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives written on a piece of paper; that he then proceed, in the presence of the House, to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of the Member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present session: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order; and that every seat, after having been selected, shall be deemed vacant if left unoccupied before the calling of the roll is finished.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think that last session we drew seats for the whole Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution of last session.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House do now place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written on a piece of paper; that he then proceed, in the presence of the House, to draw from said box, one at a time, said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of the Member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present session: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order; and that every seat, after having been selected, shall be deemed vacant if left unoccupied before the calling of the roll is finished.

Mr. ELIOT. I would like to say a word.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELIOT. That rule expired with the last session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and remarks are not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion and move to postpone the resolution until the first Monday of December next, when it will evidently be in order.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that, as I do not expect to take a seat at that time. I will make that motion.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a question of order. I think it is a question of order to inquire of the Chair whether it has not been, with one exception, the practice for many years to draw seats at the commencement of each session. There has been one exception since I have been in Congress, and only one.

I think that gentlemen who have, during the long session, been on the outside away from the eye of the Speaker, have a fair right now to be within the Speaker's reach.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and thinks it is in the nature of debate.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I renew the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ELIOT. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I offer the following resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report a bill for the amendment of the Constitution, providing that so much of the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution as declares that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State be, and the same is hereby, annulled.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will allow that resolution to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. It certainly is a subject over which that committee ought to have jurisdiction. I had already prepared a resolution upon that subject. I think the Committee of Ways and Means are prepared to consider it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have no objection to that reference, and I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman to have modified the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have done so so as to substitute the Committee of Ways and Means for the Committee on the Judiciary.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of three members be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Ordered, That Mr. FOOT, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. HENRICKS be the committee on the part of the Senate.

REPRESENTATION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose it is in order under this call to present a petition. I am desired by certain citizens of Louisiana to present a petition protesting against the reception of the Representatives from that State whose credentials were presented this morning. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections, to whom the application presented this morning was properly referred.

The motion was agreed to, and the petition was referred accordingly.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the report made by Colonel Thomas M. Key of an interview between himself and General Howell Cobb on the 14th day of June, 1862, on the bank of the Chickahominy, by authority of the War Department, on the subject of the exchange of prisoners of war.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is required to consider it on this day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then lies over one day under the rule.

TARIFF AMENDMENT.

Mr. COX. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That to lessen the cost of the necessities of life, the tariff upon coffee, sugar, tea, and similar articles should be reduced either by the payment of all customs in the paper currency of the Government instead of gold, or by a modification of the tariff so that an ad valorem and not a specific duty be laid upon said articles, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to consider the above proposition with a view to legislative action.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand that this is a reference simply to the committee? Because the resolution seems in the first place to affirm a proposition. If the gentleman will modify it so as to say "that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency," &c., I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. COX. The design of the resolution is to refer this proposition to the committee for their consideration, and with a view to report a bill if they think favorably of the proposition.

Mr. STEVENS. The first part of the resolution affirms that this ought to be done. I think the resolution should be modified a little.

Mr. COX. I will modify the resolution in any way the gentleman suggests. I should be very glad to have his aid in the matter.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, to modify it so as to say "that the Committee of Ways and Means inquire into the expediency," &c.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that. I will put the resolution in such shape as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. STEVENS. Let what I suggest precede the affirmation of the resolution.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to hear the resolution read as modified.

The modified resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed, with a view to lessen the cost of the necessities of life, to inquire into the expediency of reducing the tariff upon coffee, sugar, tea, and similar articles, either by the payment of all customs in the paper currency of the Government instead of gold, or by a modification of the tariff, so that an ad valorem and not a specific duty be laid upon said articles.

Mr. DAWES. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 48, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Nixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—70.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. L. MYERS stated that his colleague, Mr. THAYER, was detained at home in consequence of a death in his family, and was paired off with his colleague, Mr. RANDALL.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. MORRILL offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a sinking fund, at an early day, for the gradual extinguishment of the national debt.

TAXATION OF DOMESTIC LIQUORS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That in any amendments to the revenue bill to be reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the said committee is hereby instructed to incorporate a provision to tax all stocks of domestic liquors on hand.

Mr. MORRILL. I should have supposed that that subject was laid at rest last session. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 63, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Ashley, Bailey, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Finck, Holman, Hooper, Ingersoll, Kelley, LeBlond, Loan, Marcy, McBride, Middleton, Morrill, James L. Morris, Leonard Myers, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Wheeler, and Wilder—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Dawes, Dawson, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kalfleisch, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Law, Longyear, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Norton, Perham, Pike, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, John B. Steele, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Blaine, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Driggs, Dumont, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Fenton, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Nelson, Patterson, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—72.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to postpone any action on this question until we shall receive the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I think it would be altogether more courteous to them to do so. There is no need of any hurry in the matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the Representatives of the people are prepared to judge of this matter for themselves. I therefore decline to accept the suggestion. I demand tellers upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN of Illinois, and Cox, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 45.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to refer the resolution to a committee?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer is not now in order.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that I am going to the President on a committee, and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] and myself have paired off on the question of the passage of this resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the report made by Colonel Thomas M. Key of an interview between himself and General Howell Cobb on the 14th day of June, 1862, on the bank of the Chickahominy, by authority of the War Department, on the subject of the exchange of prisoners of war.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to refer the resolution to the committee on the conduct of the war. They can call those parties as witnesses, if they choose, and obtain all the evidence.

Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, English, Finck, Harding, Harrington, Hoiman, Kalbfleisch, Law, Marcy, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Radford, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Ward, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—37.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual message of the President of the United States; which was read. [It will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the usual number of copies of the message and accompanying documents be printed for the use of members, and that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will examine the resolution, and if I see no objection, I will make the motion to-morrow.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the President's annual message was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir, I did not. I did not yield to any one.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion to reconsider will not be entered. It can be made to-morrow.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURNE's motion, and it was agreed to; and thereupon (at three minutes to two o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, of New Jersey, appeared in his seat to-day.

LAWS OF NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented copies of the laws, joint resolutions, and memorials of the Territory of Nebraska, passed at the ninth session of the Legislative Assembly, with copies of the Journals of the Council and House of Representatives of the said Legislative Assembly for the same session; which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill, (S. No. 352,) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table until the committees shall be appointed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill, (S. No. 353,) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

Mr. POWELL. I offer the following resolution, and, if there be no objection, ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the report and evidence taken by a military commission, of which Brigadier General Speed S. Fry was president, appointed to investigate the conduct of Brigadier General Paine of the United States Army, in and about Paducah, Kentucky.

Mr. WILSON. Let that lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

SENATORS FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will present to the Senate certain proceedings by the Legislature of Louisiana, with a communication from the Governor, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, November 22, 1864.

SIR: By the terms of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, it is made my duty to transmit to the Senate a copy of the proceedings therein referred to declaratory of the election of Hon. CHARLES SMITH and Hon. R. KING CUTLER as Senators of the United States from the State of Louisiana, as well as a certified copy of the joint resolution itself, all of which I have the honor to inclose you as directed, to which is added a copy of a subsequent joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly authorizing the Governor to deliver to the Senators their credentials.

I remain, with high respect, &c.

MICHAEL HAHN,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will lie on the table unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. WADE. In connection with that subject I desire to present a memorial of citizens of Louisiana, numerous signed, remonstrating against the admission of Senators or Representatives from the pretended State of Louisiana into the Congress of the United States, and the reception of any electoral vote of that State in counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and praying for the passage of an act guarantying republican government in the insurrectionary States, and I ask that it may have the same direction as the other papers. I present it now, and ask that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made. It will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. MORGAN. I present what purport to be the credentials of Hon. CHARLES SMITH and Hon. R. KING CUTLER, Senators-elect from the State of Louisiana. I do not propose that these persons be now sworn in as members of this body, for the Senate will be much better qualified to judge in relation to all the proceedings connected with the election after they shall have been carefully examined, and a report made by a committee of this body. I shall, therefore, propose, when the committees are appointed, that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the mean time I ask that they lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read, unless objection be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that the papers just submitted are copies of the proceedings of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana in this election, and they are somewhat voluminous, and as it is not proposed to take any action upon the subject at this time, unless some one desires the reading, I think the credentials might just as well be laid on the table and take the same course as the other papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no Senator desires the reading, that order will be made.

Mr. WADE. These papers contain arguments on the subject, and I think, perhaps, it would be better to have them all printed. I move, therefore, that all the documents which have been presented on this subject be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of committees for reports.

FRAUDS IN PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas large frauds have been discovered in the Philadelphia navy-yard, and, furthermore, many persons holding important—

Mr. STEVENS. I must object to that at present. My colleague will have his time when the States are called.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not want the States. I am for hunting up a few individuals who are thieves.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman had better postpone it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have at least a right to have my resolution read.

The SPEAKER. Not if any gentleman objects; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. But a portion of it had been read before the objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The objection could be made at any time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, my colleague has cut off the sting.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President was yesterday referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOLD BILL.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the House yesterday referred to the Committee of Ways and Means a bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] "to prevent gold and silver coin and bullion from being paid or exchanged for a greater value than their real current value, and for preventing any note or bill issued by the United States, and made lawful money and a legal tender, from being received for a smaller sum than is therein specified." I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this bill has been productive of great mischief in the brief twenty-four hours that it has been allowed to float before the public mind as a measure seriously entertained by this House. And I believe that still more mischief will ensue every day and every hour the House stands committed to such legislation, even by the motion of courtesy which refers the bill to a committee. The provisions of the bill are very extraordinary, and but for the respect I feel for the distinguished gentleman who introduced it, I should say they were absurd and monstrous. Let me read two or three of these provisions:

2. That a dollar note issued by the Government, declared lawful money and legal tender, is declared of equal value for all purposes as gold and silver coin of like denomination.

3. That a contract made payable in coin may be payable in legal-tender United States notes, and that no difference in sale or value shall be allowed between them.

5. That no person shall by any device, shift, or contrivance receive, or pay, or contract to receive or pay, any Treasury or other note issued by the United States for circulation as money, and declared legal tender, for less than their lawfully-expressed value; and any offender, upon conviction, shall suffer imprisonment not exceeding six months, and a fine equal to the full amount of the sum specified in said note.

6. That if any person shall, in the purchase or sale of gold or silver coin or bullion, agree to receive in payment notes of corporations or individuals at less than par value, he shall be deemed to have offended against the provisions of this act, and shall be punished accordingly.

I forbear to recite the remainder of the bill. I have read enough to show that if it should become a law the entire population on the Pacific coast would be liable to indictment and conviction for a criminal offense simply because they will persist in believing that in the present condition of our currency a gold dollar is worth more than a paper dollar. And still further, not limiting the scope of the bill to protection of Government currency, the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to punish, as for a misdemeanor, any one who shall agree to sell gold and receive in payment "notes of corporations or individuals at less than par value."

The whole bill, sir, aims at what is simply impossible. You cannot make a gold dollar worth less than it is, or a paper dollar worth more than it is, by a congressional declaration. I think we had experience enough in that direction with the famous gold bill at the last session. We passed that measure after a very severe pressure, and with great promises as to the wonders it would work in Wall street. It continued on the statute-book for some twelve days—gold advancing at a frightful rate every day until its repeal was effected. The bill now under consideration has already had a most pernicious effect, and should it become a law, no man can measure its fatal influence. It is for these reasons that I desire to have its reference reconsidered.

Mr. COX. It seems to me, if the gentleman wants to cut down the price of gold, that he had better not have this bill up again and have it discussed in Congress. He had better have it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and let it be disposed of at once.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to get it before the House again simply for the purpose of laying it on the table, and thus removing it from the field of controversy.

Mr. COX. I will assist the gentleman from Maine in that. But I do not agree with him that this bill has had the effect of putting up the price of gold. I think the President played the bull in his message of yesterday.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot stop now to discuss that proposition with the gentleman from Ohio. I shall be glad to have his aid in laying the bill on the table; and to that end he will of course vote to have the motion of reference reconsidered.

Mr. STEVENS. My friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has an intuitive way of getting at a great national question; one which has exercised the thoughts of statesmen of several countries for many years; one which I think is at least worthy of consideration. I do not know how far the bill is practicable, or how far it ought to be modified. But that there ought to be some law which shall prevent gambling in gold, by which it is put at two and a half times its value, is just as clear as that that system is making every man who eats food pay three prices for it, and reduces the price of the lawful money of the country to less than one half its real value.

Now, sir, I know that the gold gamblers can take advantage of anything to put up the price of gold; and you cannot prevent it unless you legislate in some way. I do not say that the legislation proposed by this bill will reach it, or that it ought not to be very much modified, but I say that it is just the legislation which England adopted during her great wars with Napoleon, and continued as a system during the whole of those wars, and found it to act beneficially. How the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE], by his intuitive knowledge of these things comes to understand at once what the ablest statesmen of England took months to mature, I cannot very well understand. It is a happy inspiration, but it is a summary way to dispose of the question. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BLAINE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 68, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Ashley, Bailly, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. White, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—63.

So the motion to lay on the table was disagreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I move the previous question upon the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to, there being, on a division—yeas 65, nays 41.

The question then recurred upon the reference of the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to postpone the further consideration of the question for ten days.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen are mistaken if they suppose that this bill contains any provision prohibiting the exportation of gold. It embraces no such provision whatever. It seems to me that the least the House could do would be to let the bill be printed and come up for consideration hereafter.

As to the statement that the gamblers in gold have carried the premium up twelve per cent. by reason of the fear that this bill may pass, those who choose to take their part may do so.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 52, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eden, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Holman, Law, Le Blond, Marcy, McBride, Middleton, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Townsend, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Bailly, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Whaley, and Wilder—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Arnold, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cravens, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dumont, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fenton, Gooch, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, Meludoe, McKinney, Amos Myers, Nelson, Patterson, Perry, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, Thayer, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—57.

So the bill was laid on the table.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] I move to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the committee on the conduct of the war his resolution calling on the President for information in relation to an interview on the bank of the Chickahominy on the subject of the exchange of prisoners of war. I am willing to make that motion, and have the vote reconsidered, provided the gentleman will agree to an amendment of his resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the gentleman please indicate the amendment he desires?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to amend it so as to call upon the President "in his discretion, and if not incompatible with the public interest," to give this information—striking out that portion of the resolution which assumes that the conversation referred to was by authority of the War Department. I will send to the Clerk the resolution, modified as I propose.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, in his discretion, and if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House the report made by Colonel Thomas M. Key of an interview between himself and General Howell Cobb on the 14th day of June, 1862, on the bank of the Chickahominy, on the subject of the exchange of prisoners of war.

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall be perfectly willing to accept the modifications proposed by the gentleman, as they do not, in my opinion, change the sense of the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the vote by which the resolution was referred to the committee on the conduct of the war will be reconsidered, and that the resolution, modified as I suggest, will be adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the resolution will be considered as adopted in the modified form proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

There being no objection, the resolution as modified was adopted.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the committees for reports; when no reports were presented.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, on examining the Journal, he finds that the committee on rules, at the last session of Congress, was raised only for that session. It fell, as all committees do unless specially revived. Therefore, if it is the desire of the House that that committee shall be continued during this session, special action of the House is necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee on rules, as raised at the last session, be continued during the present session.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES CURRENCY.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House this morning laid on the table the bill to prevent gold and silver coin and bullion from being paid or exchanged for a greater value than their real current value, and for preventing any note or bill issued by the United States, and made lawful money and a legal tender, from being received for a smaller sum than is therein specified. I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the States and Territories for resolutions and bills on leave, commencing with the Territory of Idaho.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH CHINA.

Mr. COLE, of California, introduced a bill to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SLOAN offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending section two of article one of the Constitution of the United States, that Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers of qualified electors, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was then seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it in order to move that the resolution be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I submit that motion.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to allow me to amend his resolution so that it shall provide that Senators in Congress shall be apportioned in the same way.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, amendment is not now in order.

On a division there were—ayes 34, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. SLOAN and BROOKS.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether I understand the resolution, and I ask that it be again read. If it be a mere resolution of inquiry, there can, of course, be no objection to it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to call for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. Then I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 55, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Bailly, John B. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Hooper, Ashael W. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Williams, and Wilson—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanter, Coffroth, Cox, Dawes, Denning, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Eden, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Holman, Jencks, Knabbeisch, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Marey, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruy, Radford, Rogers, Scott, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Srouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Webster, Whaley, and Fernando Wood—55.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Ashley, Blaine, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dumont, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fenton, Gooch, Griswold, Hute, Hall, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knapp, Knox, Lazer, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel P. Miller, Amos Myers, Nelson, Perry, Pike, Pomerooy, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Thayer, Tracy, Voorhes, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—67.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, moved to dispense with the reading of the list.

Mr. HARRINGTON objected, stating that when the reading had been dispensed with he had often found his name not recorded.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SLOAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary consider and report whether any legislation is needed in reference to the jurisdiction and authority of the several district courts of the United States.

PROTECTION OF OVERLAND EMIGRATION.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to this House what obstacles, if any, now interpose to prevent an early and full exchange of the prisoners of war now held by the rebels.

The SPEAKER. This being a call upon one of the Executive Departments for information must, under the rules, lie over for one day, unless there be unanimous consent to its adoption at this time.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will hear the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I object to the consideration of the resolution on this day.

The SPEAKER. Then it will lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. COX. I give notice that when the resolution comes up I shall offer the following amendment:

Resolved, That (if not incompatible with the public interests) all communications in reference to the exchange of prisoners, not heretofore published, be communicated to this House by the Secretary of War.

NATURALIZATION OF SAILORS.

Mr. ARNOLD introduced a bill for an act to so amend the laws in regard to the naturalization of soldiers as to include sailors also in its provisions; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALE OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of the mineral lands of the United States, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ENLISTMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced the following preamble and resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Whereas it is represented that many instances have occurred where soldiers have enlisted in the service of the United States during the present war to fill up old regiments, with the assurance given in some cases by the officers of such regiments, in others, by the Governors of the States where the enlistment was made, that such enlistment should be limited to the unexpired term of the regiment, being in most instances about two years, and such soldiers, by the inadvertence or fault of the mustering officers, mustered into the service for three years, contrary to the true intention of such enlistment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts of such enlistments, and what legislation is necessary to enable, or require, the Secretary of War to do justice in the premises, and report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the House I will say the inquiry is proper enough, but I would suggest a modification. Wherever the enlistment has been for three years, it has not been by the inadvertence of the mustering officer, but of the party who is mustered in. If promises were made by regimental officers, and Governors of States—and there is no question that such promises have been made, and improperly—they were made without authority of law; and if soldiers were intrapped and deceived it was owing to no fault in the mustering officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. My only object was to get the matter before the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio is chairman, that it might be considered. It is only a matter of inquiry, at any rate.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

RESTORATION OF CIVIL AUTHORITY.

Mr. YEAMAN introduced a bill to provide for the restoration of the civil authority of the United States in certain States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARD, ETC., AT CLEVELAND.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill to provide for the establishment of a navy-yard and navy depot at Cleveland, in the State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. COX offered the following resolution:

Resolved, If not incompatible with the public interest, all communications with reference to the exchange of prisoners, not heretofore published, be communicated to this House by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. This resolution being a call for executive information, requires unanimous consent to be considered this day.

Objection being made, the resolution was laid over under the rule.

FRAUDS IN PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, introduced the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas large frauds have been discovered in the Philadelphia navy-yard, and, furthermore, many persons holding important positions therein, and heretofore supposed to be of character for honesty, have been placed in confinement for alleged complicity in such theft: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of—members of the House be appointed to investigate such frauds, and others that may be discovered, with power to send for persons and papers, and that it shall be the duty of such committee to report to this House the result of their inquiry.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not like to demand the previous question; but if I do not, the resolution will go over.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to my colleague that the preamble affirms a fact which the House cannot be aware of, and he had better modify it in some way, so that, instead of affirming a fact, an inquiry into the fact shall be directed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I take it for granted that when a man is locked up he is locked up for some charge, and that there is some crime he has committed. There are sixteen men locked up.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to discussion it goes over under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have the resolution read again. When a member here offers a resolution charging frauds I hope the House will not refuse an investigation.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he modify his resolution by inserting in the preamble the words "as is alleged." At present he makes the charge.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; you have not listened to the reading of the resolution or you would have found that the interpolation proposed is unnecessary.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I think this resolution requires some debate. I am not prepared to vote on it at this time. There are many reasons why I think it should not be adopted by the House, and hence I hope that it will go over under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague has demanded the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I only wish light.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, I will modify the resolution by inserting the words "as is alleged."

The SPEAKER. There is a blank in the resolution. Of what number of members does the gentleman wish the committee to consist?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Nine.

Mr. KELLEY. There are similar allegations made in regard to other navy-yards. I ask my colleague to modify his resolution so as to make the inquiry general.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will include the arsenal at Philadelphia.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman to modify his resolution so as to refer this matter to the standing Committee on Naval Affairs, and save the expense to the country of a special committee.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask no expense. I have not asked an appropriation. These frauds can be hunted up without any appropriation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I should like to know if the resolution is debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If it is, I should like to have something to say upon the subject.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the House will vote down the previous question. I call for tellers on the second.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, and SPALDING, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 63.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to refer the subject-matter of the resolution to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I called the previous question, and therefore I am entitled to control my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The House, however, refused to second the previous question, whereby the gentleman loses his control of the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution lies over under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. When can I get a record?

The SPEAKER. When the resolution again comes up, if any motion shall be before the House upon which the yeas and nays can be ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am willing to let the debate go on to-day if the House will permit it. I am ready to say to-day what I have to say.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. And I am ready to answer you.

The SPEAKER. The resolution cannot be debated upon the same day upon which it is presented except by unanimous consent.

ABOLITION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. BROOMALL submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill abolishing and preventing the paying of bounties to soldiers enlisting in the service of the United States, and so raising the pay of soldiers as to compensate for the loss of bounties.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. ODELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the internal revenue law, by providing for an ad valorem tax upon all sales of merchandise of every description, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ARREST OF SEAMEN.

Mr. ELIOT submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the acts of July 20, 1790, and June 19, 1813, concerning the arrest of seamen, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to matters in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at twenty-five minutes to two o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 8, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. Hon. CHARLES R. BUCKALEW, of Pennsylvania, and Hon. B. GRATZ BROWN, of Missouri, appeared in their seats to-day.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for the restoration of peace and the Union, the vindication of the Constitution, and the construction of additional and adequate guarantees for the rights and liberties of the people of the United States.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to suspend the 34th rule requiring the committees to be elected by ballot, in order that they may be elected by nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the suspension of the rule? The Chair hears none. The rule is suspended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be, Will the Senate agree to the several nominations proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island?

The nominations were agreed to.

SENATORS FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORGAN. I now desire that the credentials of Mr. Cutler and Mr. Smith, Senators-elect from Louisiana, which were presented yesterday and laid on the table in consequence of the committees not being appointed, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made; and the other papers connected therewith will be referred to the same committee, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. WADE. Is it understood that the protest that I offered yesterday on that subject will be referred with the other papers?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred, with all the other papers, to the Committee on the Judiciary. There were three several documents presented, all of which will be referred to the same committee.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a tabular statement furnishing the information called for by a resolution adopted by the Senate April 11, 1864, in regard to the number of cases commenced and pending in the courts of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a report in obedience to the joint resolution of Congress approved June 30, 1864, entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, requesting information in regard to aid furnished to the rebellion by British subjects, a report from the Secretary of State and the documents by which it was accompanied; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

THANKS TO NAVAL OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In conformity to the law of July 16, 1862, I most cordially recommend that Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, receive a vote of thanks from Congress for the skill and gallantry exhibited by him in the brilliant action, while in command of the United States steamer Kearsarge, which led to the total destruction of the piratical craft Alabama on the 19th June, 1864—a vessel superior in tonnage, superior in number of guns, and superior in number of crew.

This recommendation is specially made in order to comply with the requirements of the ninth section of the aforesaid act, which is in the following words, namely:

"That any line officer of the Navy or Marine corps may be advanced one grade, if, upon recommendation of the President by name, he receives the thanks of Congress for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, or for extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON CITY, December 5, 1864.

The message was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In conformity to the law of July 16, 1862, I most cordially recommend that Lieutenant William B. Cushing, United States Navy, receive a vote of thanks from Congress for his important, gallant, and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel iron-clad steamer Albemarle on the night of the 27th October, 1864, at Plymouth, North Carolina.

The destruction of so formidable a vessel, which had resisted the continued attacks of a number of our vessels on former occasions, is an important event touching our future naval and military operations, and would reflect honor on any officer, and redounds to the credit of this young officer and the few brave comrades who assisted in this successful and daring undertaking.

This recommendation is specially made in order to comply with the requirements of the ninth section of the aforesaid act, which is in the following words, namely:

"That any line officer of the Navy or Marine corps may be advanced one grade, if, upon recommendation of the President by name, he receives the thanks of Congress for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, or for extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON CITY, December 5, 1864.

The message was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the memorial of the Washington Gas-Light Company, in which they represent that in 1860, and at a subsequent period, Congress limited the amount which they were authorized to collect from the consumers of gas; that since those acts were passed the expense of manufacturing gas has greatly increased; that the Senate has upon two occasions at the last session passed a bill allowing an addition to the amount determined upon in those two acts of Congress, and praying that a similar bill may be passed and enacted into a law at the present session of Congress. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of William C. Bryant, Henry W. Longfellow, Horace Greeley, John A. Dix, U.S. Grant, Joseph Henry, Peter Cooper, George Bancroft, Henry J. Raymond, Stephen H. Tyng, Jonathan Sturges, William M. Evarts, and many others, citizens of New York and elsewhere, asking Congress to appropriate money for the founding and support of a National Home for the totally disabled soldiers and sailors in the Army and Navy of the United States. In consideration of the importance of the subject and the high character of the memorialists, I ask that this petition be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be printed by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The order to print will be made, and the petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the resolution I introduced yesterday be now taken up. The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the report and evidence taken by a military commission, of which Brigadier General Speed S. Fry was president, appointed to investigate the conduct of Brigadier General Paine, United States Army, in and about Paducah, Kentucky.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether he is aware of the character of the report which he has asked to be communicated to the Senate? I know that the resolution leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of War to communicate the information or not, as he shall deem the public interest may justify; and I have full faith in the judicious exercise of any discretion vested in the War Department. I do not suppose that the Secretary of War would communicate anything for publication which it was improper to have published; but I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether this report of a commission, as it is denominated in the resolution, which investigated the conduct of General Paine, is a report made by a commission of which General Paine had any notice whatever, or whether it is merely the private report of some officers designated, not by the Secretary of War, but by some officer in the field, making some inquiries in regard to General Paine's conduct in Kentucky and reporting it to the War Department for its private information, and the report of a commission that General Paine never knew anything about, and never had any opportunity to appear before. If it be a report of that character, I presume the Senator from Kentucky would be just as far as any other Senator from wishing to publish an ex parte report, made in the dark, reflecting upon any person. Therefore I think that this report, if it is of that character, ought not to be communicated for publication, and, unless the Senator from Kentucky is already advised as to the character of the report which was made by the commission, that this resolution ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and let them inquire into it. I myself am very much opposed, and think it unjust to the character of any officer in the field, that a report with regard to his conduct, made out by a commission of which he had no knowledge, ex parte, and in the dark, should be published to the country to his prejudice.

Mr. POWELL. It will afford me very great pleasure to give the Senator from Illinois and the Senate all the information that I have on the subject of this report. I do not know what is in the report. I heard some persons who claimed to know state what was in it, and I have seen—

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, I did not ask what was in the report, but whether it was a report made without the knowledge of General Paine.

Mr. POWELL. I understood the Senator's question, and will endeavor to answer it. I have understood from persons in that locality, some of whom seemed to have some cognizance of the character of this report, that it contains such evidence as convicts this man, General Paine, of the most outrageous barbarities and cruelties that were ever inflicted on any people in any Christian or civilized age, and not only General Paine, but some of his subordinate officers, and some citizens, even, outside. Some of the citizens of that region of country seem to have been engaged in them. I have seen and conversed with persons who were present when this commission was in session, and from those persons I have learned the character of the evidence to some extent. It has also been a matter of a good deal of discussion in the newspapers in Kentucky. I understand that General Paine did have notice of the sitting of this commission; that he was notified that the commission was to come and assemble at the town of Paducah; and that he absented himself and took away his staff officers and others, who were equally guilty with himself. I understand from the report that there is no supposition about it, but that all the damning crimes with which this man is charged are fully proven.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will inquire of the Senator what General Paine he refers to.

Mr. POWELL. General Paine, of Illinois, I understand. I do not know the person. I never saw him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is a General Paine of my own State, and I desire not to have any impression go out that may involve him. He certainly is not the General Paine that the Senator alludes to.

Mr. POWELL. I understand that the General Paine to whom the resolution refers is from Illinois. I do not know him, and I have no personal knowledge of the facts of the case. What I state in regard to him is upon information which I have received from others. Whether the statement I have made is true or not I am not prepared to say; for, as I said before, I have no personal knowledge of the case. I understand that General Paine had notice of the fact of the meeting of this commission before it met at Paducah; but he and others implicated absented themselves from that place, and were not present when the commission made the investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is he now in the service?

Mr. POWELL. In reply to the Senator from Maryland I will say that I have seen it stated in the newspapers that he has resigned, and his resignation has been accepted; but whether the fact is so or not I do not know.

I can say to the Senator from Illinois, without having any personal knowledge of the facts connected with General Paine and his administration in and about the city of Paducah, that if a tithe of the reports I have heard be true his offenses are such as should cause him to be brought before a military court and dealt with in the harshest manner. As I before stated, I have no personal knowledge of these facts, but I hear them from such sources as to cause me to give them full faith and credit. I believe that General Paine had notice of the assembling of this commission, and that he purposely avoided meeting the investigation.

I think the resolution should be adopted so that the evidence may be given to the country. I think those parties who have been guilty of the offenses charged ought to be held up to the scorn and contempt of the community. If they are innocent they ought to have an opportunity of meeting the charges and making their innocence manifest. I desire no ex parte statements published to injure any man. I desire that all men shall have meted out to them exact and even-handed justice. I hope, for the honor of the country and for the honor of the service, that this man Paine and others who are charged with having committed offenses in that region of the country may prove themselves innocent; but I firmly believe they will not be able to do so. The proof is most positive against them, and I understand that it is contained in this very record for which I ask. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I have usually voted in favor of resolutions of inquiry, and am as much in favor of exposing the improper conduct of officers as the Senator from Kentucky; but it appears that the Senator from Kentucky is not informed at all on this subject, except by rumor. He has heard that General Paine absented himself from this commission. He admits that General Paine was not before the commission that made this report; but he has understood that he absented himself. I have understood that General Paine knew nothing about it; that this is a private, secret report of some officers, perhaps inimical to General Paine, before whom he has never appeared at all, and of whose report he had no knowledge whatever. The Senator from Kentucky has heard reports prejudicial to the character of General Paine. I have heard a very good account of General Paine, and the only complaint I ever heard in regard to him, from any source, was that coming from the enemies of the country, that he dealt with traitors and rebels in Kentucky as they deserved to be dealt with, and protected Union men. He was too severe upon the enemies of the country, in the opinions of the enemies themselves.

Sir, I do not propose to discuss General Paine's conduct. I am not sufficiently advised to do so. He is from my State; and I thought it unjust to him that a report should be published to the world reflecting upon him, (if it does so; I know not how that may be, for I know nothing that is in the report;) a report made by men acting in secret, and before whom General Paine never appeared, and never had an opportunity to appear, so far as I have been informed.

I move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, and let them inquire; and if there is a report made that reflects upon General Paine and shows that he has committed outrages—a report by a competent tribunal before which he has had an opportunity to appear and defend himself—I shall be the last man to seek to cover it up, and I shall unite with the Senator from Kentucky in exposing his conduct and bringing him to punishment; but before any such publication shall be made, I want the committee to inquire and ascertain whether this is a secret ex parte report that it is sought to publish to the country, and if it is, I am opposed to the publication of any such document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POWELL. I hope this resolution will not be referred. The Senator speaks of the investigation having been held in secret. Why, sir, there was no secrecy about it. It was a matter of notoriety in all the public journals of the West that this investigation was going on. The commission was appointed by the military authorities in that region of the country, as I understand. It was conducted by three officers of the Army of the United States, one of the rank of brigadier general, and the other two I think of the rank of colonel. The people in that region of country were invited to come up and make known all the facts touching and concerning the conduct of this man.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who ordered the commission?

Mr. POWELL. The military authorities, I understand. Brigadier General Fry was president of the tribunal, and Colonel Brown and Colonel Brannock, I think, were the associates. That was the manner in which the investigation was conducted. I am told that it was not secret. In the newspapers of the day, the general account was that General Paine was notified, but that he left and did not appear before the commission. I have no doubt that when the facts contained in the report shall be made known, they will reflect very severely on the conduct of General Paine and of others in and out of the military service. I understand that such is the character of the evidence, and I think it is meet and proper that the report with the evidence should be published.

The Senator speaks of entering into a vindication of General Paine from the assaults made upon him. I did not intend at this time to make any assault upon General Paine, and I shall make none now; but if the proper time for it shall come and the necessity for it shall exist, I think I shall be prepared to make an assault upon General Paine. Indeed, when the facts touching his administration at Paducah, and in and about Gallatin, Tennessee, shall be published, I think no man will be under the necessity of making an assault; I think the facts themselves will be crushing. I have in my possession some documents touching his administration in Tennessee, obtained from a gentleman of the very highest authority. I shall not introduce them here now, because I do not think this is the proper time; but I want the country to know what have been the actions and doings of these officials in that region.

The Senator says that General Paine has only been too severe on rebels, the enemies of the country. How does he know that? Only from report and rumor about this man's administration. I have no complaint to make against General Paine for what he may have done to rebels, but I want to see what have been his actions and doings in regard to loyal men, not only as to their persons but as to their property, for I understand that he has made very free use of the property of other people. These allegations are made. I want to see the evidence, to learn whether they are true or false. As I before said, I personally know nothing about General Paine or about these transactions; but he is represented as a heartless monster, and a robber of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent; and where men have violated the just laws of war, and trampled upon the rules of common honesty and common decency to the detriment and injury of my constituents, I deem it my duty in every proper manner to have the facts laid before the country in order that the guilty culprits shall be held up to the scorn and contempt of honest men. For that reason, and in order that the public service may be promoted, and that all in future may take warning by the infamy that shall attach to this man provided he has been guilty of the offenses charged against him, I want this evidence laid before the country. I should suppose that no friend of the Government would wish to withhold from the people evidence in regard to the conduct of its officials of such a character as every Senator here who has read the public journals must know the testimony is in relation to this man, General Paine. I do not know whether General Paine is guilty or not; I know that I have heard from innumerable persons in that region of the country that he is guilty, and I know that the public press has charged him most distinctly and explicitly during the last two or three months with guilt, and that, too, on the assertions of gentlemen who were engaged in this commission taking the evidence.

I can see no good reason for referring the resolution to the Military Committee or any other committee. The resolution is carefully worded. If the Secretary of War should, in his discretion, think it would not be proper to give this testimony to the country, he can withhold it. It is left to his discretion, and I so framed the resolution for a purpose. I thought that per possibility the Government might wish to arrest some of the persons implicated in this record, and I did not wish to give them a chance to escape. If there are such persons at large it would be manifestly improper to publish the testimony, and hence the resolution leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of War to give us the record or not, at his pleasure. I suppose, however, that the names of all or nearly all the persons implicated in these transactions have been before the country in the newspapers for months back. I know that the papers in Kentucky and in the gentleman's own State—Illinois—have been teeming with articles on this very subject. I trust the Senate will not hesitate to call for the record which is on file in the War Department.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have read the report that was made by the commission referred to in the resolution, and it involves, if true, not only offenses but crimes of the deepest dye. I do not know whether the report be true or false. I should be exceedingly gratified if it were to turn out to be untrue, and if General Paine was guiltless of the offenses imputed to him in that report. I would now suggest to my colleague that it seems to me a discretion in relation to giving or withholding the report ought not to be confided to the Secretary of War. I think that discretion should never be confided to or exercised by any other officer than the President of the United States. It seems to me, too, that the Senate has the right to call for, and that there is a propriety in its having access to, any report that is made by a military commission and returned to the War Office. I therefore suggest that this report be called for, and after it is received by the Senate the Senate may make such disposition of it as it may please. If justice to General Paine requires that the report, when it is made to the Senate by the War Office, shall be referred to the Military Committee, it may then take that course, and the Military Committee would be authorized, as I think they ought to be, in justice to General Paine, especially as the investigation was made in his absence, to reinvestigate the truth of the charges and imputations made against him in the report. I think the Senate ought to call for the report, and that, when the report is made to the Senate, at the instance of any Senator whatever it should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for its examination and a report upon that report, and to hear additional testimony exculpatory of General Paine, if he or any of his friends desire that such proof shall be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POWELL. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] speaks of this report as a "record," and of "evidence," and both the Senators from Kentucky tell us that this was an examination in the absence of General Paine. It is wrong to designate it as evidence or a record at all. One of the Senators tells us that he has seen it.

Mr. POWELL. It has been published in the newspapers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This report has been published already! It is a very singular proceeding. I have never seen it, and I never will be a party to the publication, by the Senate, of a report reflecting upon any man, that is got up in his absence, and without an opportunity for him to exculpate himself, if he is charged with offenses in that report. Now, the Senators ask to have this report communicated to the Senate; and the object is to make public, I understand one of the Senators, that which has already been published in the newspapers. I should like to know who put it there. The truth about it is that no military commission has ever sat upon the conduct of General Paine before whom he has appeared or had any opportunity to appear, or of whose sessions he has known anything; but somebody, inimical to General Paine, has got together a commission out in Kentucky somewhere, and made reports to the War Department reflecting upon his conduct in the management of his department, whatever it was, while he was in command there, as I understand.

Now, my proposition is that this resolution (which seeks to bring this partial, ex parte, inquisitorial report before the country for the purpose of damaging a man who has never had an opportunity to appear before the tribunal) shall first go to the Committee on Military Affairs that they may inquire at the War Department, and if it is a report that is proper to be communicated to the Senate, if it is a report made after investigation, where the party has had an opportunity to exculpate himself and he has not done so, let it be called for and published to the country, and let him take the consequences of his misconduct. The very object which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] has in view is not an investigation of the conduct of General Paine. The other Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] speaks of it as if General Paine was on trial; but that is not the question; that is not the proposition before the Senate. The simple proposition here is to call out for publication an ex parte, inquisitorial report of some unauthorized commission, or, if authorized, probably authorized by some subordinate officer, but not authorized by the War Department. I am opposed to having any such report published or called for, as I understand this to be. But if I am mistaken as to the character of the report the Committee on Military Affairs can recommend the passage of the resolution, and the report can be called for.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator will permit me to ask him whether General Paine has requested a court of inquiry or a court-martial since the supposed report was made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not aware that he has or that he knows of this report. I have had no communication with General Paine in reference to it. I know the gentleman; he is a highly respected citizen of my State; a gentleman of good reputation and standing. I know nothing about these imputations that are thrown out upon hearsay here. I have had no communication with General Paine; but inasmuch as this resolution pointed to the bringing before the public of a report which I have understood here in Washington reflects upon his conduct as a military officer in the discharge of his duties while in command in Kentucky and in Tennessee, and a report made without his knowledge, he having had no opportunity to appear before the commission, I thought it unjust to him that any such publication should be made. If I am misinformed as to the character of this commission and the character of the report, the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the resolution will go if my motion prevails, will ascertain how the fact is and let the report be called for and published, for I am the last person to cover up or screen the misconduct of any official.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL and others. Let us dispose of this question.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LANE's motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after a short time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 8, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the chief of the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DUTY ON CIGARS.

Mr. STEVENS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report to the House joint resolution (H. R. No. 124) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; and ask its consideration at the present time.

The resolution provides that so much of the act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1864, as refers to the tax or duty on cigars, shall be so construed that the tax shall be assessed on the real value, whenever the owner shall fix the value of the cigars. If the inspector or assessor shall deem such price below the real value, he may, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, take the same at the price named, to be sold for the use of the Government, under authority of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section two provides that returns relative to cigars may be made monthly or bi-monthly, instead of weekly, as may be directed by the assessor.

Section three provides that manufacturers of cigars may have their cigars inspected and stamped, and pay the tax upon the same at any time before as well as at the time of sale.

Section four provides that the stamp shall indicate the amount of tax paid or payable.

Mr. BROOKS. This is a very important bill; although I do not wish to delay whatever action may be necessary upon it, yet I would like to see the bill in a printed form.

Mr. STEVENS. The bill is already printed, but if there is any difficulty about it I would be willing to have it postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BROOKS. It is a bill which I would like to have go before my constituents, and while upon the floor I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] a question. Perhaps it is premature; but as the subject is suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, I may ask the gentleman if it is likely that there will be any change of duty upon tobacco. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends that a tax be laid upon leaf tobacco. If such a tax be laid, it will change the duty upon cigars.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not for me to say whether there will be any change. It has been recommended by the Department that a tax be laid upon leaf tobacco. The committee have had some conversation upon the subject; but the committee have not been full, and therefore have not come to any conclusion. Nor can I inform the gentleman what the action of the committee will be; much less what will be the action of this House.

Mr. BROOKS. Would it not be wise to wait a few days, until we have some action of the committee upon the subject of leaf tobacco, before we change the duty on cigars?

Mr. STEVENS. Although I am willing to postpone the consideration of this joint resolution, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] desires it, I may suggest here that, in the opinion of those best acquainted with the subject, the Government has already lost millions by the construction put upon the act of last session by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; that the tobacco dealers, instead of paying the duty of eight dollars which the law requires, are paying, and have been paying, but three dollars upon the millions and millions of cigars which have been sold. There has, therefore, been lost to the revenue the difference between three and eight dollars per thousand upon the large amount that have been manufactured and sold, or which may be now on hand. It is in my judgment essential that this joint resolution should be speedily passed. If any gentleman desires more time to consider the subject, I will move to postpone it until to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I presume the House will adjourn over until Monday next. I think that, after the statement which has been made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. STEVENS,] we should all agree to pass this joint resolution to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. I will make a statement of the evil to be remedied; then I will not call the previous question, but allow the gentleman [Mr.

Brooks] time to move to postpone it until a future day.

Mr. BROOKS. This is a subject upon which I am now quite unprepared to act, and which I have but hastily considered. But I will say that, in the opinion of a large number of honest manufacturers of cigars, it will be quite impossible, under the principle of the law as it now stands, ever to have an honest taxation of cigars. The temptation to fraud is so immense, the duties are so great, and it is so impossible to detect those frauds, that with the principle by which the duty is now laid upon cigars, I do not believe there can be any legislation devised which will produce the result which the honorable gentleman suggests.

It has been suggested that it is practicable to have a stamp, like that of the post office, to be affixed to each cigar, so that whenever a duty is laid upon a cigar the stamp will show whether it has been paid or not. I have no doubt, from the best information I can obtain, that a stamp of one cent, like that used in the post office, on each cigar, will yield a larger revenue than can ever be obtained upon any principle like that contained in the old bill, or that suggested in the new one.

One great system of fraud under the present law, and which the remedy proposed by the honorable gentleman will not correct, is the use of old cigar boxes with the stamps upon them, in which are put new cigars which have not paid duty. I think if the honorable gentleman will take a little more time he will lose nothing, but will accomplish what he and I undoubtedly both desire.

I have no personal interest in this matter, not using tobacco in any form or shape whatever, and therefore I am entirely disinterested upon this subject. But if the honorable gentleman will consult with others who are practically acquainted with the subject, and give the House due time to consider it, I think he will come to the conclusion which has struck my mind, not irrevocably, but which has impressed me with considerable force, that the true way to collect the duty on cigars is to put a stamp upon each cigar.

Mr. STEVENS. I am not ready at this time to say what is the best mode of preventing frauds; and there is the great difficulty. At present, however, the committee do not propose to attempt any alteration of the law. They propose no more than that Congress shall declare what we suppose to have been the meaning of the act of Congress of last session, in contradistinction to what we consider the very erroneous decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask my friend from Pennsylvania whether there is no way of correcting such decisions except by a joint resolution of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. There may be some other way; but at any rate I consider this method the most effectual.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest to my friend that the system devised in the law of last session seems, in its practical operation, to be so complicated, that, so far as I know, it is, among the cigar manufacturers of New England, found to be utterly impracticable. My friend will, I think, be very soon satisfied, in the course of the session, that this is not the only legislation that will be required upon the subject. Cigar manufacturing has been entirely, or almost entirely, stopped by the singular law of last session, or its more singular construction. The law was certainly sufficiently perplexing; but the construction of it has increased the difficulty instead of diminishing it. I have great apprehension that there will be required something more than a simple joint resolution to lead us out of this wilderness into which somebody has brought us. I hope that my friend will be patient, and will address himself and the labors of his committee to clearing up the smoke which surrounds this subject.

A MEMBER. What kind of smoke?

Mr. DAWES. Cigar smoke, of course. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to object to the consideration of the bill at this time? If so, the bill must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BROOKS. I should be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would agree to postpone the bill to a given day, so that there could be a little discussion on it. I would not object to a postponement to a given day some time next week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to object only to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not desire to object; but I trust the gentleman will consent to a postponement of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I have already said that if the gentleman will allow me to make the statement which I desire to make, I am willing that the consideration of the bill shall be postponed. I have no desire to press the matter unduly; but I think the subject should be acted on without any unnecessary delay, because the Government, under the present construction of the law, is losing every day some thousands of dollars of revenue on the manufacture of cigars.

Mr. BROOKS. I think that if the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow the bill to be postponed until Tuesday or Wednesday next, that will be soon enough to act upon it.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow the bill to be taken up now, I will state the evil which, in the opinion of the committee, it is important to remedy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill by the House at the present time?

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my objection, with the understanding that after the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the bill will be postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, among the provisions of the act of last session are the following laying a tax on cigars:

"On cigarettes made wholly of tobacco, and also on cigars known as cheroots or short sixes, valued in each case at not over five dollars per thousand, three dollars per thousand.

"On cigars valued at over five dollars and not over fifteen dollars per thousand, eight dollars per thousand.

"On cigars valued at over fifteen dollars and not over thirty dollars per thousand, fifteen dollars per thousand.

"On cigars valued at over thirty dollars per thousand and not over forty-five dollars, twenty-five dollars per thousand.

"On cigars at over forty-five dollars per thousand, forty dollars per thousand; and the valuation of cigars herein mentioned shall in all cases be the value of the cigars, exclusive of the tax."

It is under that clause of the law that the difficulty with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has arisen. By his construction, he has declared that we must wait until the sale of the cigars, and that if they sell for less than thirteen dollars per thousand they are subject to a tax of only three dollars, although the law says that cigars valued at over five dollars per thousand shall pay a tax of eight dollars per thousand. The result is that all cigar manufacturers, so far as I know—certainly all the principal manufacturers—have stopped business, and have sold out or leased their establishments to their foremen. The manufacturer sells the tobacco to his foreman, who manufactures the cigars, and in that form sells the tobacco back to the dealer, the principal man, at thirteen dollars per thousand, and on these cigars a tax of three dollars per thousand is paid; whereas it is well known to every man who knows anything about the subject that at the present price of tobacco and the present cost of manufacturing there cannot be and is not a single thousand of cigars made for less than five dollars; and therefore if they were rated at their true value they would all be subjected to a tax of eight instead of three dollars per thousand.

But, under the idea which the Commissioner takes, that you must take it for what it sells as the value—and he instructs that that is conclusive—the sale governs the inspectors and assessors. Then, sir, nine tenths of the cigars manufactured since the last session of this Congress up to the present day—nine tenths, I venture to say, have paid but three dollars tax.

Now, what I propose, Mr. Speaker, is that instead of the sale actually made being the conclusive value for the tax, the tax shall be assessed by experienced inspectors, and that upon the value fixed by them the tax shall be assessed, although that tax will bring it above thirteen dollars.

That is all there is of it. It construes the mode of finding out what is the value of cigars.

I provide also, what is the provision of other laws, that when the inspector or assessor suspects extensive frauds by undervaluation in the sale or purchase of cigars, he shall be at liberty to take the cigars at the price fixed on them by the owner, for the use of the Government. That is the system adopted by many foreign nations where there is a suspicion of undervaluation or fraud. It allows the Government to take the cigars at the price fixed upon them by the owner.

There is another reason why the present law should be amended. Making returns weekly may be very well in the large cities, but in counties as extensive as my own, where a great many hundred women and children manufacture cigars, it is very inconvenient for them to make returns every week. My proposition provides that, in the discretion of the assessor, monthly instead of weekly returns may be made.

Another evil exists under the present construction of the law: the stamp put upon cigars which pay a three-dollar tax, is an eight-dollar stamp; and they go forth to the world as having paid eight dollars when in reality they have only paid three dollars. This provides that the stamp shall state exactly what tax has been paid, and is payable, which tax shall be assessed before the sale, instead of waiting till the time of sale.

All the cigars which have been inspected since the passage of the act referred to—and there are hundreds and millions of them—have escaped the payment of the eight-dollar tax, for there is not a cigar made which, under the law, comes under the three-dollar tax.

I believe, sir, I have stated all of the evils and proposed remedies. The committee have not had time to consider all of the remedies that may be proposed. We have not seen the recommendations of the committee, although we know something of them. We will be glad to have suggestions from every member. Especially would we be indebted to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] for the right way of construing the law.

If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] desires it I am now willing that the matter shall be postponed to a day certain.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are seven postponements from the last session, which will take priority.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not see that I do not concur in the general remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The evils he speaks of are well known, and were anticipated in some degree when the law was passed. The gentleman will recollect that at the time we had some discussion on the subject in the House. It was not a full discussion, for we were necessarily required to move with rapidity.

The honest manufacturers of cigars desire an amendment of this law; there is no doubt of that; but there are great difficulties in the whole matter, and I hope the Committee of Ways and Means will take time to consult in regard to some of them, and particularly in regard to the laying of a tax upon leaf tobacco and cigars in one and the same bill and at the same time. And I hope they will take into consideration the subject of a tax upon cigars, for I am informed by men well informed, honest manufacturers of cigars, that a tax of one cent upon each cigar will yield a larger revenue than it is possible for us to get in any other way. The fact is that the tax upon cigars is so enormous here and in all countries that unless the Government takes the whole subject into its hands, as in France, and regulates the production, purchase, and sale of tobacco, it will be impossible to prevent fraud and smuggling. Smuggling of cigars is about to be, and will be, immense from the Canadas, and no law or remedy of ours can prevent that smuggling except by putting a stamp upon each cigar.

Let me make another suggestion to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens.] His joint resolution provides that "whenever the owner or possessor (as agent) of cigars shall fix the value thereof, or allege a certain price for which he pretends to have purchased them or offers them for sale, if the inspector or assessor shall deem such price below the real value, he shall be at liberty to take the same at that price for the use of the Government, giving the owner or agent a certificate of the value, who shall be paid the same on presenting the certificate to the Treasurer of the United States or his deputy." Doubtless it is well known to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and to all others, that the manufacturers of cigars are ingenious, and that the judges of cigars are few and far between, and that the assessors likely to be appointed by the Government to inspect these cigars are less likely to know anything of the subject than any other class of men who will be invested with authority upon the subject. And I should not be surprised, under that item of the bill, and under the prevailing high prices, if the royal characters of Spain should be imprinted frequently upon boxes of cigars in order to sell them to the assessors at three, four, or ten dollars more than the cigars are really worth. This is a subject which needs consideration and ought to be looked into immediately; and it is obvious to everybody who knows anything of the manufacture of cigars, that our Havana cigars, which bear so high a character for quality, are the production of the good people of Connecticut, and of tobacco grown upon the banks of the Connecticut river.

Mr. L. MYERS. I desire that a time for the consideration of this resolution shall be fixed at an early day. In my district the greatest interest is felt in the matter. The law and its construction have operated prejudicially to both the cigar manufacturers and to the Government, and the income has been greatly reduced thereby. I trust we will proceed to the consideration of the resolution at once, if an early day cannot be fixed for its discussion.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to one or two amendments not contained in the printed copy of the bill before him, one of which is designed to meet the objection he made touching the possibility of a misvaluation upon the part of the assessor and fraud upon the part of the owner. In the bill before the House is interlined after the word "liberty," in line seventeen, the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury," so that the inspector or assessor may take them subject to such approval. The object of that clause is to enable the owner, upon the one part, if injustice has been done, to appeal, or take proceedings in the nature of an appeal, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to enable him to dispose of the action of the assessor; and on the other hand to enable the assessor to take such action as, upon advice, he may deem best to secure the rights of the Government. I do not know anything safer than that. Every law is liable to be misadministered. This clause protects both.

A single word upon another point. As is well known, we expected by this measure to realize a considerable addition to the revenue. The law as passed is not the bill as it emanated from the Committee of Ways and Means. That bill, as it passed the House, was modified in the Senate, and that modification concurred in by the House. But the point of importance now to be considered is that where we ought to get eight dollars a thousand and we are getting only three; and that fact every day affects essentially the revenue of the Government, as stated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The great object of the action now is, not to insist upon the permanence of the system itself, but to make it effectual, leaving the whole subject of a change of the system open to the action of the House and the committee having charge of it.

I hope, therefore, with the explanations made, the House will see fit at least to send this measure to the Senate as early as possible; and I think we are justified in asking as early a day as possible for its consideration, in order that the revenue may be saved that which it is admitted we are now losing. That is the whole object and purpose of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. As it does not seem satisfactory to the gentleman from New York to consider this matter now, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that it be considered on Monday next.

Mr. KELLEY. Will that interfere with matters that were postponed at the last session?

The SPEAKER. It would if it should be made a special order, which would require unanimous consent. In that case it would take precedence of other business. The Chair has examined the Journal, and all the postponements from last session are simple postponements; there are no special orders. Is there objection to this bill being postponed until Monday next and made the special order for that day?

No objection was made; and it was ordered accordingly.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RESTORATION OF CIVIL AUTHORITY.

Mr. YEAMAN. I rise to a privileged question. Introduced yesterday a bill to provide for the restoration of the civil authority of the United States in certain States, and through inadvertence had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The subject-matter would properly go before the Judiciary Committee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, with the view of giving it the proper reference.

The motion to reconsider prevailed, and the bill was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer resolutions distributing the President's message to the various committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not mean to object, but I want to avail myself of some early opportunity, with the consent of the other side of the House, to make some remarks on the President's message, and I desire that opportunity in the early part of the session, before we are pressed with business.

No objection being made, the resolutions presented by Mr. STEVENS were read and agreed to, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

THANKS TO CAPTAIN WINSLOW.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In conformity to the law of July 16, 1862, I most cordially recommend that Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, receive a vote of thanks from Congress for the skill and gallantry exhibited by him in the brilliant action, while in command of the United States steamer Kearsarge, which led to the total destruction of the piratical craft Alabama on the 19th June, 1864—a vessel superior in tonnage, superior in number of guns, and superior in number of crew.

This recommendation is specially made in order to comply with the requirements of the ninth section of the aforesaid act, which is in the following words, namely:

"That any line officer of the Navy or Marine corps may be advanced one grade, if, upon recommendation of the President by name, he receives the thanks of Congress for his important, gallant, and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel iron-clad steamer Albemarle, on the night of the 27th October, 1864, at Plymouth, North Carolina.

The destruction of so formidable a vessel, which had resisted the continued attacks of a number of our vessels on former occasions, is an important event touching our future naval and military operations, and would reflect honor on any officer, and redounds to the credit of this young officer and the few brave comrades who assisted in this successful and daring undertaking.

This recommendation is specially made in order to comply with the requirements of the ninth section of the aforesaid act, which is in the following words, namely:

which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

UNEMPLOYED GENERALS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was not in the House when the Committee on Military Affairs was called, and I ask permission now to make a report from that committee.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers. I will state that the bill is a modification and extension of the joint resolution passed at the last session of this Congress, and I only ask that it be recommitted and be ordered to be printed.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the naturalization laws as to provide that persons liable by law to the performance of military duty, who, during the existing rebellion, have left and continued absent from the United States, or may hereafter leave the United States, with a view to avoid any enrollment or draft for military service, or who, having been, or hereafter being, enlisted or drafted, or accepted as substitutes in the military service of the United States, may have been, or may be, guilty of desertion from such service, and shall have gone, and remained, until the passage of such amendatory law, in any foreign country, or may hereafter go to any foreign country, to escape arrest for such desertion, shall, from the date of such abandonment of their own country, either to avoid enrollment or draft, or to escape from arrest for desertion, be held to have forfeited and given up all rights and privileges of citizenship of the United States, and be only capable of naturalization thereafter by declaration of intention, oath of allegiance, and probation of five years, as in the case of other aliens; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

TRADE WITH REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the eighth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to the general acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States," &c., approved July 2, 1864.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at one o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

Monday, December 12, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D.D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

Hon. JAMES HARLAN of Iowa, Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE of Rhode Island, and Hon. J. M. HOWARD of Michigan, appeared in their seats to-day.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a memorial of members of the bar of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, praying that authority may be granted to that court to employ a stenographic reporter; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the petition of Frances Elliott, of Richland county, Wisconsin, praying to be remunerated for the loss of certain money in United States notes, occasioned by the burning of her house in January last; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of soldiers of the first and third Iowa cavalry, praying that they be mustered out of service on the expiration of the term of service of their regiments in pursuance of a promise, as they allege, made to them by the mustering officer at the time of muster in; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of California, praying for the passage of House bill No. 560 to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Soscol Ranch, in the State of California;" which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the directors of the Western Associated Press, praying for a reduction of the duty on foreign printing paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of James Crutchett, praying for compensation for the use of his property in Washington city by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON. I present a petition of Major General Weitzel, late commander of the eighteenth Army corps, and four hundred and seventy officers of that corps, asking for an increase of the pay of officers to the extent of twenty dollars per month, and that the price of the ration may be commuted at fifty cents instead of thirty. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, simply saying that the price of provisions has increased more than three hundred per cent. since the law was passed, making it extremely difficult for officers of the Army to get along.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I present also the petition of Colonel T. W. Higginson, asking for the repeal of so much of the fourth section of the act approved July 4, 1864, as distinguishes between colored soldiers that were free and those that were slaves before the 19th of April, 1861. I move the reference of this petition to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of E. W. Moores, C. O. Morris, and J. M. Boyd, masters in the Navy not in the line of promotion, who represent that they have been attached to the New York, Washington, and Boston navy-yards seventeen, eighteen, and nineteen years, and have been from twenty to forty years in the naval service, and have been on constant duty. They now ask that they may be relieved from their present straitened circumstances in consequence of their small pay of $1,200 not being sufficient to support their families, and they ask to be allowed $1,609 50 per annum for shore duty, and $1,200 as retired pay. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I also present the petition of Charles Fosdick Fletcher, who represents himself to be a citizen of the United States, and prays Congress to pass a law at the present session for the establishment of a railroad along the line of the twenty-second parallel of latitude, following as nearly as practicable the surveyed route from New Orleans to San Diego, in California, with a branch to San Francisco, with like powers, privileges, and immunities to those which have been granted to other companies chartered by Congress. I move that this petition be referred to the standing Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am requested to present—the Senate may dispose of it as they see proper—a memorial of William Cornell Jewett, showing the impossibility of peace through home action, and praying for a reference of the points at issue to an international congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator propose any reference?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. FOOT. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have had under consideration a joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 114) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building, and recommend its passage, and authorize me to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to expend so much of the contingent fund heretofore appropriated as may be necessary for the enlargement of the Navy Department building to meet the wants of the Department.

Mr. FOOT. If the Senate will indulge me in a word of explanation, this joint resolution passed the House of Representatives near the close of the last session, was sent to the Senate for concurrence, and referred to the appropriate committee. Through inadvertence on my part it was not then brought to the attention of the committee. During the last days and hours of the session, in the crowd of business, it was overlooked, and consequently failed of action in this body. The committee now direct me to report it and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its present consideration. I will state that it involves no appropriation, but merely authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to expend so much out of the contingent fund as may be necessary to erect a wing by way of enlargement of the Navy Department building. That addition is in process of construction, and now nearly completed. I understand its entire cost will be about fifty thousand dollars, which is about equivalent to the sum paid for two years' rent of buildings necessary for the accommodation of the clerical force and employes of that Department.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 81) for the restoration of peace and the Union, the vindication of the Constitution, and the construction of additional and adequate guarantees of the rights and liberties of the people of the United States; which was read a first time by its title and passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 354) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota and regulating the disposal of lands heretofore granted said State to aid in the construction of such roads; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FARWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 355) to amend "an act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," passed May 6, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's annual message as concerns our foreign relations be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

INCREASE OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the propriety of the immediate passage of an act to increase the revenue, first, by an additional tax of one per cent. upon all sales of real and personal property, including also all bargains for the sale of merchandise, produce, gold or silver coin, or stocks of any description; second, by an additional tax of twenty-five per cent. upon the gross receipts, to be added to the present rates, of all railroad fares, including street railroads, steamboats, and ferries, to be collected by the companies or persons running the same, for the use of the Government. And that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the propriety of the passage of a law to prevent the further expansion of the currency by the organization of any new banking associations except when they may take the place of some existing State bank. And that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the propriety of redeeming all the outstanding interest-bearing legal-tender notes by issuing in their stead other notes, in denomination not less than fifty dollars each, bearing a uniform interest, from the 1st day of January in each year, of three and sixty-five one-hundredths per cent. per annum, with coupons attached, to be paid out, and to be made a legal tender for their face, with interest added.

As this is a simple resolution of inquiry, instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the subject, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

COASTING TRADE.

Mr. FARWELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety of consolidating the three great districts, and for providing that licensed vessels may trade to ports on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts without clearance and entry at the custom-house.

AMERICAN SAILOR BOYS.

Mr. FARWELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law that vessels engaged in foreign trade shall employ or take on board American boys, at least one for every five hundred tons measurement.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further legislative business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

On motion of Mr. POWELL, the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution submitted by him on the 7th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the report and evidence taken by a military commission, of which Brigadier General Speed S. Fry was president, appointed to investigate the conduct of Brigadier General Paine, of the United States Army, in and about Paducah, Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose, sir, to discuss the question further, but simply to make a statement in answer to some interrogatories which were put to me when the resolution was up before. I was then asked by some Senator, I think the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] whether or not this General Paine was now in the service. I have written a note to the Adjutant General on the subject, and I am informed by that functionary that General Paine has tendered his resignation, but it has not been accepted, and he is still in the service. I had seen it stated in the newspapers that his resignation was accepted, but that seems to have been a mistake.

I was also asked by whom this commission was appointed, and I was unable to answer the question. I am now advised by the Adjutant General that it was appointed by Brevet Major General Burbridge, commanding the Department of Kentucky.

I will further remark that a little mistake appeared in the report in the Globe, and the Senator from Illinois seemed to catch my remark as the reporter did. I am made to say in the Globe that the report of this commission had been published in the newspapers. That was a mistake. The statement I made or intended to make, was that accounts of the report had been published in the newspapers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it was the Senator's colleague who stated that.

Mr. POWELL. I am reported in the Globe as saying that the report had been published, and I understood the Senator from Illinois to comment on my remark as if I had said so. The idea I intended to convey was that I had seen accounts of this report, newspaper articles purporting to give some of the points in the report. I have never seen the report; it has not been published in the newspapers, to my knowledge. The mistake was a very trifling one, to be sure.

I think this document is of such a kind and character that we ought to have it. I hope the Senate will vote down the motion of the Senator from Illinois. I can see no reason for referring the resolution to a committee. I hope it will be adopted at once. The document is a public record in which the people of the country are very deeply interested, especially the people in the region where these transactions occurred.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Connors, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Lane, of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Teller, Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, and Wright—8.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Carlile, Cowan, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane, of Indiana, McDougall, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Wilkinson—11.

So the motion was agreed to, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A few moments since, my colleague stated to the Senate that he expected a communication from the President in relation to an important office in Indiana, upon which it is desirable to have immediate action. In order to ascertain whether such a communication has been received, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, December 12, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 10, 1864.

SIR: I have resigned my seat in Congress, to take effect on the 30th instant. I will leave for Albany on Monday next, and as it is not probable that I shall return in the mean time, I now tender my resignation as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and also on the committee on the rebellious States.

Very respectfully,

R. E. FENTON,

Thirty-First District New York.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLfax,
Speaker House of Representatives.

VACANCIES ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced the following appointments to fill vacancies upon sundry committees of the House:

On the Committee of Ways and Means, in place of Mr. Stebbins, Mr. J. V. L. PRUYN.

On the Committee of Ways and Means, in place of Mr. FENTON, Mr. D. C. LITTLEJOHN.

On the Committee on a Uniform System of Coinage, &c., in place of Mr. Stebbins, Mr. DWIGHT TOWNSEND.

On the select committee on the rebellious States, in place of Mr. FENTON, Mr. T. T. DAVIS.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports to go on the Calendar, and not to be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. This being the alternate Monday, and the morning business not having exhausted the morning hour, in accordance with the rule of the House the morning hour expires with the conclusion of the business appropriated to it. The Chair will therefore call up the special order for to-day, being the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to the duty on cigars.

DUTY ON CIGARS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the House joint resolution (No. 124) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS. Several gentlemen feel a difficulty about this question of the tax upon cigars, for, as they say, there is so much involved in it. After some conversation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue I feel some apprehension that either he has misunderstood us or we have misunderstood him in reference to this subject. In order, therefore, to give farther opportunity for examination, I move to postpone this resolution until Thursday next.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will permit me, I will read a note which I have received from a large national tobaccoists' association recently held in New York, and of which I have no doubt the members of this House have read notices in the public prints. I read this in order to call the attention of the House to what they desire:

NEW YORK, December 9, 1864.

SIR: I am directed by the Tobaccoists' National Association to request that you move for a suspension of the consideration of the tax as relating to cigars and tobacco for about two weeks, when the association will be able to present a plan which was adopted in convention of all the interests in this city on the 7th and 8th instant, and which it is believed will be found satisfactory to the Government.

Very truly yours,

EDWARD BURKE,
Corresponding Secretary.

HON. JAMES BROOKS, M. C.

Mr. STEVENS. Those gentlemen desire a postponement for two weeks. I fear we shall not be in session then. But I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that when it comes up on Thursday next, if there is any further difficulty about it I shall not object to its going over. I hope, therefore, this joint resolution will be postponed until Thursday next.

The question was taken upon the motion to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution till Thursday next, and it was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, through Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolution (H. R. No. 114) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 106) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of certain moneys therein mentioned;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 114) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building; and

An act (H. R. No. 563) in addition to the act respecting quarantine and health laws, approved February 25, 1799, and for the better execution of the third section thereof.

NAVAL DEPOT FOR IRON-CLADS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 536) authorizing a survey at and near New London, Connecticut, and the establishment of a navy-yard for iron-clad vessels thereat, postponed from the last session till this day by order of the House.

The bill was read at length.

Section one authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a competent engineer to designate and survey a site on the river Thames, at or above Winthrop's Point, near New London, Connecticut, for the establishment of a navy-yard and naval depot for the construction, docking, and repair of iron, iron-clad, and other naval vessels.

Section two authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, upon the completion of the survey, and a tender of a good title to the land designated, to accept the same, and establish thereat a naval depot.

The pending question was upon the following substitute proposed by Mr. KELLEY:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the city of Philadelphia a title to League Island on behalf of the Government, if said title be perfect, and to establish thereat a navy yard and depot for the construction, docking, and repair of iron, iron-clad, and other vessels.

Mr. KELLEY. Presuming, Mr. Speaker, that most of the members of the House have read the recent very able report of the Secretary of the Navy, I will spend no time in pressing upon their consideration the importance of the establishment of a yard or station for the construction, cleansing, and repair of iron and iron-clad vessels. I may, however, remark that it is not and has not at any time been the policy of the Navy Department, or of the Administration, to increase the number of navy-yards or stations. They have simply asked that Congress, recognizing the exigencies of a new age, an age of iron vessels and steam propulsion, should allow them to so enlarge and furnish an existing station as to enable them to meet those exigencies. There is, at Philadelphia, a station containing something more than fifteen acres. It is the only station in the country lying upon pure fresh water, and in the vicinity of abundant supplies of coal and iron, and for the service of which the Government can at any time, upon an hour's or a few hours' notice, command an adequate supply of mechanical skill, experience, and power to execute any work required at such an establishment as the necessities of the Navy may require.

And the city of Philadelphia, finding its commercial growth impeded by the location of this yard, has tendered to the Government, not in exchange for the old and limited site, but as a free gift, an island, containing in all about six hundred acres, nearly one half of which is primitive land, and the remainder accretions made in the long course of centuries. It is known as League Island, and lies at the confluence of the Delaware and Schuylkill, the two rivers which connect that great emporium of coal and iron with the regions from which they come. It needs but about fifteen hundred yards of additional road to connect it by rail with every mine, and forge, and furnace that has been open twelve months within the broad limits of the State of Pennsylvania, and can, by two days' labor of an adequate gang of workmen, be connected with every street railroad that leads to the homes of the working masses of Philadelphia.

It is offered, I say, as a free gift to the Government; and while the people of Philadelphia will graffy their patriotic pride in making such a donation, they will find compensation for their munificence in the taxable value of the fifteen acres now occupied as a station, but which, it is hoped, the Government will, soon after accepting League Island, put into the market, to supply a fund wherewith to make the necessary improvements upon the new and extended site.

The substitute for the bill of the committee which I submitted does not, therefore, propose the creation of a new establishment. It does but propose the enlargement of the Philadelphia navy-yard, and the transfer of its site to a point about five miles lower down the river Delaware, though within the city limits. Objections have been made to the acceptance of this site. It is suggested that New London furnishes a more advantageous position, and such is the opinion of the majority of the Naval Committee. In general answer to this suggestion, I refer the House to the minority report made at the close of the last session of Congress.

In view of the opinions of the majority of my colleagues on the committee I make the broad assertion, and challenge sustained and advised contradiction to it, that New London offers no one of the great essential qualities for such a site, namely, adequate breadth of pure fresh water, perfect defensibility, cheap coal and iron, and an unvarying supply of skilled laborers in the metals, while they are all to be found in a greater degree and more striking combination at the point indicated by the substitute than at any other, not only in our broad country, but in the civilized world.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to bring a practical test to the judgment of the proposition I have just uttered. It is said that the men of New England are fond of making money; that they are given to enterprise, and are very astute in the discovery of judicious fields for enterprise. What the Government needs is a large workshop for iron and steel work; and it is proposed to locate it at New London, in the State of Connecticut. I turn to my native city, of which League Island is a part, and find in her, next to my country, the object of my pride and love. I look at Philadelphia and observe her steady and rapid growth, her intelligence, her productive power, the comfort with which her laboring people are housed, the affluence with which education is provided for their children, the number of churches of all the Christian denominations which they have erected for themselves; and I find enough to command the pride and affection of any son of hers, native or adopted. And I ascribe the grand results which I find her embodying to two conditions, mainly: first, that she lies in close proximity to the muscles of modern civilization, coal and iron, which have been given to her people in greater abundance than to those of any other of the American States. I find coal in greater variety than is found in the same space anywhere else in the wide world, and iron in equal abundance and rich variety; so that her people, in this the agony of our country, have been able to establish and carry to magnificent results, in less than three years, factories for steel which already rival those of Sweden. When the war began we could not manufacture a first-class gun-barrel from American iron; while to-day we can make of Pennsylvania iron and export better barrel iron than we can import. There is no branch of industry, from the digging of the coal, the limestone, and the iron, to the manufacture of gun-barrel iron, steel, and the best imitation that has yet been produced of Russia sheet-iron, that does not abound within the city or at points near to it and connected with it by railroad.

These rich gifts of nature are one element of Philadelphia's increasing wealth, comfort, and importance. The enterprise, the energy, the skill of New England, traveling through New London to Philadelphia, have done much to give these elements development, and largely constitute the other condition alluded to. Who were the first great machinists of Philadelphia? They were New England men, who had scanned the advantages of New London before they left their native New England to come there—the Merricks. Whitney is a New England name. Bement is another. So you may go through scores of our leading workshops, and find that the enterprising sons of New England, seeking for a position in which to employ their skill and ability in iron and steel works with greatest advantage, have passed through the non coal-producing State of Connecticut to locate where we ask the Government to put its iron workshops. I find in this constantly-recurring fact proof of the correctness of my views. The shrewd, forecasting, enterprising, and skilled sons of New England, in their earnest purpose to succeed in life by availing themselves of nature's advantages, find no attraction at New London, but come in swarms to Philadelphia, and realize their golden dreams. Shall we, in defiance of the vindicated judgment of so many successful sons of New England, locate a fresh-water establishment in salt water? Shall we locate our iron-works in the city of a State in which there is no coal, while a fresh-water city so abounds in that essential article? Shall we locate our great machine shop in a city which produces no steam engines, and has no mechanician skilled in the branches of industry to be employed in such an establishment? Shall we locate it in a State which produces but about twenty-five per cent. of the amount of such products as are produced within the limits of the city of Philadelphia alone?

Shall we, if I may be permitted to repeat the pregnant question, fly in the face of the experience of the emigrating sons of New England connected with iron-works and machinery, and carry these great works to a point which has offered no temptation to him among them all who was most patriotically and affectionately devoted to his native New England?

Mr. Speaker, all the argument derived from abstract theory, and all the argument resulting from experience, proclaim New London a site that no practical business man would accept, and proclaim League Island to be a site to which they have come from every point of the compass to find their enterprise successful and their labor well rewarded.

And, sir, we may derive a lesson on this subject from the war now pending. Wherever our armies have had commanders that would permit them to fight they have driven the enemy before them; and at least one of the admirals of our Navy has written his name high above that of Nelson or of Collingwood. Farragut stands today in naval history without a peer. Our Navy is the grandest the world has yet seen. We have added to it more vessels during the last year than it numbered at the breaking out of this war—more by nearly twenty-five per cent.—and yet the blockade runner makes her way into the rebellious ports. We took New Orleans and opened the Mississippi river. We added to the glory of our country and our naval history the achievements before Mobile and Charleston, but how few insurgent cities have we taken? Is it not true that Sherman has just concluded or is about concluding the most marvelous march ever made by an army, a march from the banks of the Mississippi to the coast, in order that he might do what our Navy cannot—open an Atlantic port? And why cannot so gallant and well supplied a Navy do it? Because the southern ports are not exposed, as New London, but, like League Island, lie at the head of rivers that may be obstructed. There is the whole secret of it. Our Navy can do whatever a naval force with skillful and dauntless officers can do, but they cannot open obstructed rivers, or perform other impossibilities; hence it is that Charleston has baffled them for years, and Mobile still baffles Farragut, the lion of the sea. And history, acknowledging these truths, will not disparage the Navy when she records the fact that the army of the West marched from the Mississippi to the Atlantic to open a port and give a base of supplies in one of the harbors of Georgia.

Yet in view of these glaring facts, the majority of the committee have reported in favor of putting the great iron-work shop of the country at one of the four most exposed points offered by our whole extended coast! There are along our thousands of miles of coast but four ports which La Gloire, the Warrior, and the other monstrous iron ships of Europe can enter; and New London is one of them. New London, lying about five miles from the open sea; New London, lying within two miles of the mouth of a tidal stream whose waters are driven back by the salt water of the Atlantic ocean; New London, lying within less than six miles of the broad surface of the Atlantic ocean, and about two miles from Long Island sound, into which those iron monsters could enter through two channels, one two miles and a half and the other two and a quarter miles wide, in either of which no single point can be found with less than thirty feet of water at low tide.

Who will obstruct two miles and a quarter of almost bottomless channel where the great ocean flows into our great American Mediterranean, Long Island sound? and who will simultaneously obstruct the other two miles and a half of deep water flowing under such a pressure? It is a result with which the imagination of man will not grapple, and none will say that it can be accomplished. This point is urged as an advantage, and we are told that New London will thus protect New York. Why, sir, New York finds her protection against approach by the sound at Hell-gate. The traveler of the sound will see that no large vessel can now approach New York from that point, and that it is there, and there alone, that the Government can give abundant protection to New York.

New London cannot protect itself, the Government of the United States cannot protect it, and hence with its magnificent harbor, commerce has never located a mart there; mechanical industry has never found it a fitting abiding place. It is a beautiful city of ten thousand inhabitants, and if by my word I could increase the value of its outlying lots I would do it. It will grow in time by its sea-side attractions, and I will rejoice at its prosperity, but I cannot consent to promote it by making it necessary for all time to come to keep an iron-clad fleet, able to cope with the fleets of the world, to protect the workshops and store-houses in which we shall gather implements and materials in time of peace to enable us to engage in naval warfare, if it shall be put upon us by the nations or by Providence.

It is said the Delaware river is not wide, and is tortuous. It is true it is not as wide as the Mississippi; it is true that upon a narrow bar running between shores not divided by five hundred yards there is, at low water, but twenty feet and five inches of water; at high water, some twenty-five feet or more. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the minority report demonstrates the fact that for warfare on the American coast no vessel is available which draws over twenty-three feet of water; and such I find to be the judgment of every experienced officer of the Navy with whom I have conversed.

The shallow bar and obstructions in question are among the great commendations of the point, for there, and just below them, we could sink those obstructions which we have found alike dangerous and impregnable in approaching southern cities. Of this advantage we could avail ourselves if necessary, though the river offers ample depth for every vessel constructed, constructing, or likely to be constructed, to be used in the service of any navy on the American coast, and ample verge and scope enough for free entrance and departure for any we shall ever build.

It would be well enough in the discussions which are to take place upon this subject—for I hope, as the question is an important one, it will be freely examined—to bear in mind the fact that salt water not only impairs the character of the iron on vessels, but that it so clogs it as to diminish essentially the speed of the vessel. So much as ten tons of barnacles have been taken from the bottom of a single vessel. Among the earlier monitors, two were sent home almost simultaneously, for cleaning; one went to the yard at Charlestown, and the other came to the yard at Washington. It was found almost impossible to clean the bottom of that which went to Boston. Indeed it was impossible to clean it without injuring the iron. The incumbrances were those which salt water naturally inflicts upon exposed iron surfaces. The other, as I have said, came to Washington, and after lying one week in the fresh water of the Potomac, a common spade was the only instrument used, and the surface was perfectly cleansed. The attachments are the disease inflicted upon iron by salt water, for which nature has provided one remedy only—fresh water.

If gentlemen will examine the minority report they will find that the British and French Governments have been engaged for years, with the aid of various scientific associations, in endeavoring to discover some means by which they may protect the bottoms of iron vessels against such parasites, and how they may free them from them; and uniformly the same result has been arrived at, namely, that salt water, coat them as or with what you may, affects iron surfaces, and that mechanism and science have not been able to suggest any means of relieving iron vessels of such matter without damaging the iron plate.

Now, if we adopt the project of establishing a new naval station, and of placing it east of the Hudson river, where there are already three; if we are determined that we will, against the protest of the Administration, and especially of the Navy Department, increase the number of naval stations upon the Atlantic coast, and crowd one more into New England, let us do it with our eyes open, knowing that when craft constructed there are ready to go to sea, if we wish them to use their fuel with economy, and make such speed as other vessels make, we must send them to the Delaware or some other fresh-water stream to clean them, and then let them go upon their march over the mountain wave. There, on the other hand, while vessels are being painted or refitted, nature would apply her own medicament, and the vessel would leave the wharf as she left the stocks upon which she had been built. If you wish to waste some months of every year of the life of your vessels by sending them into fresh water solely to be cleaned, put your station in salt water or at the mouth of a tidal stream, and lay your vessels up dismantled or in ordinary in the waters of the sound or the Atlantic.

If, on the other hand, as I have suggested, you wish the time required for refitment or repair to cleanse and purify and fit the vessel for a new cruise, you must put a station with ample anchorage and wharf room and repair shops upon fresh water. Again, if you would avoid another expense to which I have incidentally alluded, that of maintaining an iron-clad fleet equal to the iron-clad fleets of the world, do not put your repair and construction station at an exposed place. Do not put it where La Gloire, the Warrior, and other vessels of that class may move up to within two or three miles of your station and bombard it. Bear in mind that twelve hundred yards give impunity to an iron-clad against any ordnance yet tested by any Government, and that nothing short of a superior fleet, lying at all times to guard the wide entrance into the sound, can protect the proposed site at New London from bombardment by the fleet of any nation.

But again, do you want your great naval station to be held at the mercy of a few land monopolists and a few laborers? New London cannot furnish homes for the skilled workmen needed by such an establishment, and she is without population from which to draw laborers. But somebody may say, in reply, that the report of the so-called scientific commission shows that New London can call upon New York to supply these deficiencies. Permit me, in passing, to make this criticism upon that report—that it has failed to show by what process one hundred and fifty miles is reduced to less than ninety-nine miles. That report, in the face of all the facts—of nature's great fact the distance, of railroad tables, of railroad charges, of the scale of time for mails—the majority of those impartial scientific men in their report have boldly announced that one hundred miles is a greater length than one hundred and fifty miles, and put New York and her skilled workmen nearer to New London than to Philadelphia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, permit me to call the attention of the House to a few parallels or comparisons between the two sites, with reference to skilled laborers, and to connect therewith the idea of the necessary force for the defense of the naval station if assailed by an army.

"The city of New London, as appears by the census of 1860, has a population of 10,115. The city of Philadelphia has over 11,000 skilled workers in iron and brass, and over 5,000 skilled machinists; while very few, if any, of the 10,000 people of New London are workers in iron and brass on a scale commensurate with establishments unrecognized as among the shops and foundries of Philadelphia. The navy-yard at Philadelphia is the smallest of our naval stations. It employs at this time about 2,500 workmen, almost every one of whom is the head of a family, and allowing them an average of five members to each family, it will be seen that, small as that station is, its workmen and their families constitute a population that could not be housed, in the Philadelphia fashion of a separate house for each family, in New London, were the entire population of that beautiful city to surrender their homes to them."

Where will you get the skilled workmen to construct the yard and build the shops at New London? You must import them, and build the homes in which they may dwell. And in these facts you find the key to the pertinacity with which New London is pressed on the attention of the Government. For I again affirm that it has no single one of the essential elements necessary for such a station. It has found the sanction of no single son of New England for establishing there a business such as the Government proposes to establish at the naval station in question.

"Philadelphia has more skilled machinists alone than New London has male population of all trades, callings, and ages; she has more workers in brass and iron than New London has population, male and female; and her adult workers in the metals and coal outnumber the entire population of New London, male and female, by more than one hundred per cent."

Sir, another very striking fact to be borne in mind in this discussion is that the annual growth of Philadelphia, for a long series of years, has been more than the entire population of New London, as ascertained by the census of 1860. Gentlemen will find this fact established by official tables set forth in the minority report.

What is the annual produce of Pennsylvania in coal and iron? In the year previous to the census of 1860, as shown by that census, she produced, of bituminous coal, 2,679,772 tons; of anthracite coal, 9,397,332 tons. While she produced nine millions and nearly one half of anthracite coal, all the other States in the Union yielded one thousand tons! While she produced 2,679,772 tons of bituminous coal, all the other States together produced but 3,162,000 tons. Connecticut, the State in which, and on a very exposed point of which, permit me to say, it is proposed to locate this establishment, be it remembered, produces, as I have said, not one ton of coal, and has not the promise that she ever can or will produce one. It is not even hinted that coal is hidden within her womb. In the matter of iron, Pennsylvania, during the year preceding the taking of the census of 1860, produced 1,706,476 tons of iron ore; and with that Connecticut compares 20,700 tons. Of pig iron, Pennsylvania produced 553,560 tons; Connecticut produced 11,000. Of bar iron, Pennsylvania gave 259,709 tons; Connecticut gave 2,060 tons.

Mr. Speaker, without examining such material facts more minutely, I ask what is there to induce this Government at this time to establish a new naval station? Are there not enough naval stations east of the Hudson, settle the question by which standard we may? If they be regarded as points of protection, are there not in the three lying east of the Hudson, enough, at least relatively with the number located or likely to be located along our coast, to give that protection? Has the water of New London special qualifications? You will be told that it is not salt; that the proposed site lies near the mouth of a tidal stream. I tell you, sir, that science has demonstrated that such a position is even worse than one of which the waters are salt to the very surface.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 2.

In the report made to the British Association for the Advancement of Science for 1863, on page 27 I find the following:

"The more sanguine advocates of iron ship-building have, in their anxiety to prove their durability to be such as to render protection needless, appealed to the existence of iron canal-boats of forty years of age or more, and to some of the earliest built iron vessels which have been occasionally in salt water. Most of the vessels alluded to, however, have been principally in fresh water, and on referring to Table XV it will be obvious how vast a difference there is in the durability of a ship of any given sort of iron exposed to the action of sea and of fresh water."

This statement is followed by tabular statements of the results of experiments decisive of the questions involved.

In another report, made by Mr. Mallet to the same Association, to be found in the Transactions for 1840, page 227, it is said:

"I would here remark a cause of increased corrosive action affecting castings, such as cast-iron piling, &c., at the mouths of tidal rivers, which has not to my knowledge struck previous observers: It is well known that the sea water, during the flowing of the tide, from its greater density, forces itself beneath the river water like a wedge, and slowly and imperceptibly mixes with it; hence two strata, one of fresh or brackish water, the other of salt water below it. Thus, while engaged in a diving-bell survey of part of the bed of the river Bann, in the north of Ireland, last year, I found, during the flow of tide, the water strongly saline at the bottom of the river, and yet fresh enough to drink within three feet of the surface; the total depth of water being about twenty-five feet; and in the proceedings of the Royal Society of Edinburgh (April, 1857), will be found a paper by Mr. Stevenson, C. E., in which he describes an analogous phenomenon as occurring at the mouth of the river Dee, at Aberdeen. In the rivers Forth and Tay, and at Loch Eil, where the Caledonian canal joins the western sea." On taking up water at various depths at Fort William he found the specific gravity:

At the surface.....	1008.2
At nine fathoms.....	1023.5
At thirty fathoms.....	1027.2
or completely fresh at the top, and salt as the sea itself beneath.

"Now, Becquerel has proved that a homogeneous metallic surface, (a rod or line for instance,) exposed to the action of a fluid monstium, will assume a state of electrical tension, provided that the fluid in which it is immersed be of different density in two strata, i. e., of different corrosive power.

"In fact, the metal and the two layers of fluid constitute a voltaic pile of one solid and two fluid elements; hence, as one end of the metallic rod will be in a positive state with respect to the other, it will be corroded faster than the other.

"Now, this is precisely the condition of any casting reaching through a considerable depth of water at the mouth of a tidal river. The water being salt below and above, the part of the casting immersed therein (the lower end of a cast-iron pile, for instance,) will therefore be in an opposite electrical condition to that of the portion above, and the amount of corrosion of the positive element due to the kind of iron and the state of the water will be further increased or 'exalted' by the negative condition of the opposite end, which will be itself in the same proportion preserved.

"This principle extends to very many practical cases as to iron plates, &c., partly immersed in a solvent fluid, and partly exposed to moist air, &c.; and it suggests the importance of giving increased scrutiny to all castings intended to be so situated, to allow for this increased local destruction of material."

If gentlemen will have the kindness to refer to page 26 of the minority report, which I have caused to be laid on their desks, they will find evidence from the highest scientific authorities that such locations are even more destructive from the electric or magnetic effects they produce than those which bathe vessels so far as they are submerged in salt water.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose briefly to recapitulate the reasons why, in my judgment, the substitute, rather than the bill, should be adopted.

It is not proposed by the substitute, as it is by the bill, to increase the number of naval stations and add to the expenses of the Government the maintenance of the entire staff of a new station. It proposes to meet the exigencies of the case and avoid that increase of expenditure. It is not proposed to purchase a site, or to accept one on other conditions than those which propose by the sale of that now in use to create a fund adequate to make large improvements, at least to put the new site in a condition as useful as—nay, by reason of its length of wharfage and the broad and safe anchorage it affords at all seasons of the year, far more useful than—the present Philadelphia station.

It must be apparent to every person familiar with the market value of such property that the price which could be obtained for the Philadelphia yard would make, on the broad surface of League Island, a station infinitely more efficient than the present one. Therefore, while it offers an extension of facilities, it offers also the means of adding to their improvement. It is needed for iron-works. It is upon fresh water, and would be for that reason an infirmary or hospital, (if I may so say,) in which nature would be the physician, for iron or plated vessels which had contracted disease while lying off the mouth of the sound protecting the city of New London, or elsewhere in salt water.

We cannot keep an iron vessel in Long Island sound three months and not damage her speed by the barnacles that will accumulate upon her bottom. Every day she is there will, if we mean to keep up her speed, increase her demand for fuel; for every hour will increase the number, exposed surface, and weight of the insects which her corroding iron surface will attract, and create a necessity for heavier motive power to give her ordinary speed. This may go on for a little while—a few months at most—until the mass of accumulation shall have become so great that, put all the fuel you can, put all the steam you can upon her, you cannot move through the water the jagged mass of obstructions clinging to her at the speed which a clean vessel, just from a week's bath in fresh water, could make.

We would economize money and time by sending our vessels merely to lie in fresh water for the week that would cleanse them, and to go abroad again. No man upon this floor will assert that an iron vessel can be cleaned in any salt-water harbor except by taking her out of the water by heavy and expensive machinery, and then using expensive mechanical and scientific implements and processes. No man will advisedly assert that after such application has been made the bottom can be cleaned without detriment to the iron.

Next, League Island is a safe position; safe at all seasons; safe if combined Europe should thunder from its fleets upon our coast; safe as Charleston has been made by obstructions, as Mobile is, as Wilmington is, and yet so accessible that the commerce which reaches it every year equals the entire commerce of Long Island sound, embracing New London and every point between that and New York. It was Mr. Webster's proud but poetic boast that fifty thousand sails shadowed the waters of that sound. Year by year, month by month, and day by day, throughout each and every year the commerce of the Delaware maintains itself at a point numbering about fifty thousand arrivals and departures per annum. So that the river, to which the objection is made that it is narrow, that it is crooked, that it is shallow, sustains a commerce vastly greater in dollars and cents, and quite equal in the number of sails, to the entire commerce of the "American Mediterranean."

And, in my judgment, it is a proof of its fitness for the objects under consideration that the majority of the committee in support of their adverse conclusion have sought from every source of information, reliable and unreliable, evidence that occasionally, among the more than thirty-six thousand vessels arriving at and departing from Philadelphia annually, an occasional wreck occurs. That they have been able to find so few is, in my judgment, evidence of the fitness of the place.

The author of that report is so far forgetful of American law as not to remember that twenty-one years of continued residence may change the legal domicile of a citizen of the United States. On page 4 of that report it is alleged that Professor A. D. Bache is a citizen of Philadelphia. Now, that distinguished gentleman assures me that for twenty-one years he has been a resident voter of the District of Columbia. And I will inform the majority of the committee that Professor Bache, of Philadelphia, never was on any commission appointed by the Government. Happily those who know the distinguished head of the coast survey will repel any insinuation against his integrity or patriotism.

But I must hasten to a close. League Island is on fresh water. It is in a safe position. It is where supplies of all kinds are abundant. It is where the commandant, at any and all times, upon a day's or an hour's notice, may summon the mechanic or artisan he needs for any of the branches of industry it is proposed to conduct at such a station as the Secretary of the Navy requests us to establish. The situation is a central one; New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland would furnish supplies, workmen, and protection to it as well as Pennsylvania, and with her would feel its protecting power.

Mr. Speaker, we are acting for the United States and for posterity. We are not to legislate in any mean, narrow, or sectional spirit; not to punish one locality or reward another; not to canvass the patriotism of one people or signalize our detestation of the want of patriotism of another people. And did I believe that there was a superior site to League Island within the rebellious lines, which we might soon make available, I would say for our country and for posterity, let us go on for awhile as well as we can until we can secure to them those superior advantages. I believe, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, that not only our own country but the world does not present the same combination of cheap, abundant, and various supplies of material and labor for such a workshop as the Navy needs on fresh water. And so believing, and because I so believe, I shall urge as best I may the adoption of the substitute, and the acceptance of Philadelphia's munificent offer of League Island to the Government for a naval station and workshop.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, on the 17th of last January the Committee on Naval Affairs were charged by the House with the duty of inquiring into and reporting to this House upon the expediency of the establishment of a new yard especially adapted to iron-clad vessels, and with the further duty of reporting to this House a proper site for the location of such a yard. The matter naturally divided itself into two branches of inquiry, and the resolution itself made that provision, in directing the committee to inquire, first, as to the necessity of such a yard, and secondly, the proper point of its location. With reference to those two branches of inquiry, the result of the investigation of the committee is now before the House in the bill and the report with which the bill is accompanied.

With reference to the first branch of inquiry, the committee, with very great unanimity, came to the conclusion that the establishment of a new navy-yard, such as is recommended by the naval authorities, adapted to the wants of what may be called an iron navy, had become a national necessity. It is not my purpose to enter into details now with reference to the considerations that controlled the committee in their conclusions in reference to the necessity of such a yard.

But it may be proper that I should state a few striking facts to the House from which each member may run out the argument himself as to the necessity of such a yard, which is the first branch of the inquiry. In the first place, it is a very striking fact that at the commencement of hostilities the American Navy consisted of but seventy-six vessels of all classes, principally wooden sailing ships. Of these only three were at the disposal of the Department at the firing upon Fort Sumter. We have now in the American Navy six hundred and seventy-one vessels, of which five hundred and fifty-nine are steamers, and seventy-one iron-clads. At the commencement of hostilities the American Navy consisted of less than six thousand seamen, of whom less than two hundred were at the disposal of the Navy Department for the purpose of managing the ships then under its control. The Navy now consists of more than six thousand officers and forty-five thousand seamen. And while this marvelous increase has been going on two of our naval establishments have been lost to the country and rendered useless. Now, these considerations are very strong with reference to the necessity for new naval facilities. But a much more striking argument, it seems to me, arises from the consideration of the change that has been effected in the whole system of naval architecture and naval warfare. The American Navy is now essentially a steam and iron Navy. Steam has become an indispensable element to all fighting ships. The days of those old wooden ships of war, those wooden walls rising tier above tier with their frowning batteries, those wonders of our childhood, those glories of our early naval history, and, it may be added, the terror of our foes, have passed away, and have passed forever, and their old hulks are now lying rotting at our navy-yards as practice ships for midshipmen or schools for naval apprentices. Steam and iron have revolutionized naval architecture and naval warfare the world over, and especially that of this country. And, as I heretofore observed, our Navy consists of five hundred and fifty-nine of these steamers, and seventy-one of these iron-clads.

And yet while this is true, we have not to-day, in the striking language of the Secretary of the Navy, a yard where a shaft can be made for a steamer, or a plate for an iron-clad. So far, to be sure, we have succeeded tolerably well in this warfare against a belligerent who is entirely destitute, or almost entirely destitute, of ships, men, and naval resources, and where the exigencies of the day call merely for the enforcement of a stringent blockade; but if the day should ever come—far distant may it be, sir—when, in a war with a first-class naval Power, it should become our duty, ship for ship, and fleet for fleet, upon the ocean to contend for the scepter and sovereignty of the seas, we should never sufficiently regret that we had not in time of peace prepared an ample yard for the repair of vessels disabled in ocean conflict, and for maintaining our position as a first-class Power upon the ocean.

I can only add to these considerations that, as a measure of economy alone, we have it from the most prudent naval authorities that the establishment of such a yard would be a saving of money year by year to the Government. We are now in the hands of private contractors entirely, both as to prices and as to the time for the completion of contracts; and the saving in demurrage, delay, and excess of prices since the commencement of the war, in the estimation of those whose opportunities are best for information, would have been equal nearly, if not quite, to the cost of such a yard as is recommended by the committee. As an instance, it has happened that one of the most efficient steamers in the Navy, the Niagara, lay for fourteen months entirely useless because repairs could not be effected in less time at private yards, and in another instance the gunboat R. R. Cuyler for ten months awaiting repairs which might have been completed in sixty days, and at an expense equalling the entire first cost of her machinery. The Secretary of the Navy, in his last report, tells us that two of our iron-clads, the Miantonomah and Tonawanda, are now two years behind the time promised for their completion by one of the most responsible of contractors, when their presence in the James river or the waters of the Carolina sounds might give a finishing blow to the tottering fortunes of the rebellion; and to obviate the pressing necessity, he has already established ten temporary stations along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, namely, at Key West, Norfolk, Baltimore, New Orleans, Pensacola, Memphis, Baltimore, Hilton Head, and other places, whose aggregate cost would more than compensate for the current expenses of such a station as is contemplated.

Viewing, therefore, these considerations, which we have merely suggested rather than elaborated, governed by the fact that the Secretary of the Navy has in all his reports for the last three years urged it specially upon the consideration of Congress, and the further fact that the President of the United States has considered it of such prime importance as to give it special prominence in his last two annual messages, your committee could not avoid the conclusion that the time had come for the establishment of a great navy-yard and station to meet the enlarged wants of the service and the revolution in naval architecture.

With regard to the second branch of the inquiry, as to the proper site for the location of such yard, I think I have the judgment of the House with me when I say that a question of that sort, the location of a great naval station, involving an examination of the most complicated problems of engineering and naval science, involving an investigation of a great variety of facts, and important as it is in its consequences whether the decision be right or wrong—such a question is one upon the consideration of which a committee of this House, however able, might well hesitate to enter.

But it was our good fortune, in entering upon this path of inquiry, to find that it had been trodden before by a board of experts raised by Congress for the consideration of this very question; and that every step of our pathway was illumined by the light shed by that board of officers.

And here, if I can get the attention of the House, I should like to go back for one moment, in order to state to the House the history of the legislation upon this question of the location of a navy-yard, as all-important for the proper decision of the subject. The Secretary of the Navy first recommended this subject to the attention of Congress and the country on the 25th day of March, 1862, by a letter to the Naval Committee of the Senate. Immediately, with that alacrity of patriotism which always characterizes the "City of Brotherly Love," that city at once, with an eye to the advantages obtainable to the Government and to itself, tendered League Island to the Government for the purpose; and with a haste that admitted no delay, and a zeal that tolerated no modification, a bill was attempted to be forced upon the Senate fixing upon the country League Island as a place for this naval station. And, as an ominous feature in that bill, significant of the value of the "munificent gift," an appropriation of $200,000 was put into it as the first installment for filling up League Island. It was only by the persistence of Senators in the other Chamber that, finally, the friends of that measure accepted a modification, and consented that a board of officers should be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to examine all the sites that were named and that were prominent before the country, and to report to the Secretary by the "selection of which site the public interest would be best promoted." Congress directed the Secretary of the Navy to appoint that board, and the question being narrowed down, in the opinion of Congress, as shown by the debate in the Senate, and in the mind of the country, to the respective merits of League Island and New London, the Secretary of the Navy, in the recess of Congress, composed that board by appointing six men, officers and engineers, of whom three were from the city of Philadelphia.

I know the disclaimer of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] upon the floor this morning, that Professor Bache was not from the city of Philadelphia. But I have taken pains to examine the Blue Book that is distributed by the Government authorities, and find that Professor Bache hails from Philadelphia both as to birth and as to designation; and that his children and grandchildren holding offices in the Navy all hail from the same place, and are so designated in the book.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I allude to this fact, not for the purpose of impugning the character of the Secretary of the Navy. I am not to be drawn here to-day into a discussion of his motives, unless I am driven to do so in self-defense as the debate progresses. But I have a right to state facts, and I have a right to the benefit of the facts when stated. And I state that, the question being whether New London, Connecticut, or League Island, Philadelphia, was the proper place for a naval station, and that having by Congress been ordered to be decided by a board of officers, that board of officers was composed, by the Secretary, of three citizens of Philadelphia, one gentleman from New York, one from New Jersey, the engineer of the Department, and not a human being from all New England in it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield one moment for a correction?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will; but the gentleman will bear me witness that I did not interrupt him.

Mr. KELLEY. I think that justice requires that the gentleman should name the three citizens of Philadelphia to whom he refers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I shall state no fact that I do not hold myself responsible for, both in debate and out of debate, here and elsewhere. I trust that the gentleman will chasten his impetuosity by his prudence and endeavor to moderate his zeal by his courtesy, and will allow me to pursue the course of my argument, as I have allowed him to pursue the plan of his own, without interruption. Inasmuch, however, as the gentleman has challenged me to name those gentlemen, I will do so. I name Captain Marston; I name Commodore Gardiner; I name Professor A. D. Bache.

I now go on further. Having alluded once before to the gentleman's disclaimer while the gentleman was out, and that is, I think, his only excuse for his interruption of me, I go on to state this fact, which cannot be disputed, and proof of which I hold in my hand, and challenge contradiction, that before his appointment to this commission Professor A. D. Bache had written a letter, which was published in the Congressional Globe, volume forty-nine, part four, page 3247, and used in the debate in the Senate of the United States, a copy of which was furnished to the Navy Department, in which he urged the acceptance of League Island as a highly eligible place, and gave his reasons for it; and that after that letter was published, after it was used in debate in the Senate, and after it was on file in the Department, Professor Bache was placed upon this board, and consented to act with that record before the world. Now, sir, why do I allude to this? Simply as a ground for the argument, which I think is legitimate, that that board thus constituted had no bias in favor of New London, and no bias against League Island. That is all. I impugn not the motives of the Secretary of the Navy. Let him stand or fall by the judgment of his countrymen; he has friends enough to defend him. I will not be either his defender or his accuser. Nor do I enter into questions of delicacy or decency with Professor Bache. I have a right to say that I am satisfied with that board, its constitution and its action. It was composed of gentlemen of great eminence in their professions. It had, as its president, Admiral Stringham, one of the soundest minds and honestest hearts in the Navy—a man who had just won the first naval victory of this war, who had advanced your drooping standard off that storm-vexed Bermoothes, Cape Hatteras, and inspired the heart of the country by the first naval victory achieved during the conflict. That board embraced, as another of its members, the engineer of Yards and Docks in the Navy Department—the very man whose business it is to select the sites for navy-yards, and to construct and engineer them after selection, and who had selected and engineered the construction of many of the present yards of the country; a man in the front rank of his own profession.

The board, thus constituted, with no bias in favor of New London, with all those natural feelings, which, while we may deny them, we all know we have, and which would lead them to prefer their own neighborhood and their own friends; just the feeling that will actuate the twenty-four gentlemen from Pennsylvania in this House to strive for the floor the minute I have left it in order to defend League Island; just the feeling that will probably actuate the small delegation on this floor from Connecticut to advocate New London—that board, with that bias, having made a careful examination of the subject for over two months, decided, by a resolution which they laid before Congress and the Navy Department, "that the public interests would not be promoted by the selection of League Island, but would be promoted by the selection of New London," which they recommended.

And now, right here, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, and through you the gentlemen of this House, do you think that you are more able here to-day to decide this question aright than that board of officers, selected by order of Congress for their special competency for this work? Is there anything in the temper of this House, in the habit of attention evinced by its members, at which (without saying anything disrespectful to this House) I was astonished when I first came here, is there anything in the past study or present profession of members on this floor, is there anything in the subject-matter, complicated as it is, by which this House thinks that, upon a debate here to-day, it can more intelligently decide this question, without ever seeing the localities, than it was decided by that board of skilled officers, embracing engineers and gentlemen of high authority in naval matters, who had given it their undivided attention for more than two months? It is a subject involving the examination of tides and currents and soils and topography and defensibility, and questions of that complicated character; a critical examination of channels and of maps and of measurements, and the investigation of a vast and varied mass of facts. Do you feel yourselves more competent to decide it here to-day than that board, selected for their special adaptation for that purpose, and whose lives had been devoted to such pursuits?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania comes in here to-day, deliberately, with a confidence in himself which, to my mind, appears almost sublime, and asks you upon his argument and interested minority report, signed by himself and another gentleman from Pennsylvania, a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs—and it seems that Pennsylvania must always have two members on that committee, a double representation somewhere—he asks you, I repeat, to-day upon his report and speech to decide this great question that so seriously concerns the whole future of the Navy, and to decide it for him, and against the concurrent report of this board of officers and the Naval Committee of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the nature of this question is such it cannot be decided and ought not to be decided here. The attention of the Thirty-Seventh Congress was called to it, and it provided for its decision. It ordered that board of commissioners to examine into the subject. It is patent to my mind, from the construction of the act, that it ordered them to decide it, and that they did decide it, and that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to abide by that decision, and not to have appealed from them to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and to this House.

Now, sir, as I have said before, four out of the six, and it was an unusual number—six of a commission to decide a mooted controversy—four out of the six decided against League Island. My friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes,] who honors me with his attention, knows that, in a contested case in court that would be an exceedingly curious board of arbitration which consisted of six, with no one to give a casting vote, and of these six to have three who lived near the residence of one of the parties, and had an indirect interest in the decision, one of them having given an opinion on the case beforehand. Still, if that board, without any malfeasance or corruption, decided the case, four to two, and against the party to whom their bias inclined them, it would, I think, be strong evidence of the justice of that case. When the report of that commission came before Congress, and the Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, stated that he should accept League Island despite the action of that commission, unless Congress should otherwise order, it will be recollected that the Senate immediately, by resolution, did otherwise order. He was instructed not to accept League Island until Congress should direct him to do so.

In the report of the Secretary of the Navy, just as in the report of the minority of the committee, you hear it insinuated that the finding of this commission was in favor of a navy-yard upon "the old plan;" in other words, a yard for wooden vessels, and not such a yard as the Secretary wanted and as was necessitated by the revolution in naval architecture. To break the force of the report of the board of officers, it is over and over asserted in the Secretary's reports and by the minority that the commission mistook their duties and were led to find for "an additional yard on the old plan," and this stereotyped phraseology is repeated and varied in every form of expression and insinuation.

The short and decisive answer to this charge is the resolution passed by the board themselves before proceeding to their duties, and by which they themselves limited and defined them:

"Resolved, That after giving full consideration to the objects for which they were appointed, as indicated by the law, and inviting instructions from the Department, considering the views of the Department as expressed in the letters of the Secretary of the Navy of March 25 and June 9, 1862, and the discussions by Hon. Mr. GRIMES, of the United States Senate, and others in Congress, the wants of the Navy and the country, and the circumstances of the times connected with the progress of naval warfare, the committee are of opinion that their duty requires them to refer, in selecting a site for a navy-yard, to a first-class establishment for iron-clads and iron vessels, or to a site for laying the foundation of an establishment meeting all the requirements of an iron navy."

The gentleman who has just finished his speech as the advocate of League Island, following the path of the Secretary, has also repeated this charge against the "majority of the Naval Committee," and alleges that they also mistook their duty, and found for "an additional yard on the old plan;" and this, notwithstanding he is himself a member of that committee, and has for five months sat with them during their examination hearing witnesses, listening to arguments, gracing the committee by his presence and lightening their labors by his eloquence, during all which time they have confined their investigations to the proper site for an iron navy and an iron navy alone. And if proof of this were needed, I have only to refer to the other seven gentlemen who compose that committee, now within the sound of my voice, to the following language of their report:

"The committee cannot avoid the conclusion, therefore, in answer to the first branch of the inquiry with which they were charged, that the immediate establishment of a new yard, with special adaptation to the building and storing of iron vessels, has become a national necessity."

And to the unanswerable fact that the very bill reported by the committee, and now before the House, contemplates the establishment of a yard for an iron navy, and an iron navy alone.

Mr. Speaker, my time will not permit me to go further into the discussion of the history of that subject. Early in this Congress the matter was referred to the Naval Committee, consisting of one gentleman from Massachusetts, one from Connecticut, two from Pennsylvania, and the others from Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, New York, and various parts of the country. That committee personally visited these sites; and I affirm to-day that you cannot decide in reference to the propriety or otherwise of the selection of one of these sites without a personal examination of them. The committee visited them. They heard all of the proof and all the arguments. They started prepossessed in favor of League Island, from the fact of its central position, and from the further fact that it was favored by the Secretary of the Navy, as well as from its vicinity to coal and iron and the alleged advantage of fresh water. Starting with that prepossession, they have finally reported to this House that in their opinion League Island is entirely unadapted to the purposes for which the Government seeks to establish a depot for iron-clads.

If the House will listen to me for a few moments longer I will state what the committee found League Island to be. League Island is in the Delaware river, about four miles from the settled part of the city of Philadelphia, and is between three and four feet below the surface of the river at ordinary high tide. That is the first fact that struck the committee, as it struck the commission. And it struck them forcibly.

An island it is called by courtesy; an island it is entitled, out of abundant charity, in our report; and I undertake to say that if a writ of ejectment or trespass were brought against a wrongdoer thereon either would be abated on plea if the complainant described "the locus in quo" as an island unless it was added "covered with water." Now, the surface of that island is from three to four feet below the Delaware river at ordinary high tide, and but for the embankments which surround it it would be flowed at each recurring tide—a fact which is disputed by none.

Mr. KELLEY. As the gentleman says the fact is not denied, will he permit an interruption?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The gentleman knows as well as I do that I have not one quarter of the time I need to set the case before the House.

Mr. KELLEY. The fact is denied that the island is four feet below high water.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will quote from the record, making no statement of my own, and accepting none from interested parties. I will read from the record of a board of competent officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy:

"League Island is a reclaimed marsh, surrounded by a dry stone wall and embankment of earth raised to exclude the river. A portion of the island was reclaimed many years since, and is known as the old meadow. We have no positive information on this point, but presume that at the time the wall and embankment were built all the land worth reclaiming was embraced within the inclosure. Subsequently, and about eighteen years since, as we are informed, the inclosure was extended so as to embrace an additional area, now known as the new meadow. According to a plan which has been submitted to the board by a committee from the Board of Trade, this old meadow contains two hundred and nineteen acres, and the new meadow one hundred and fifty-five acres. On the north of the island, and between it and the main, there is a channel which, we are told, was of sufficient depth in former days to float large ships-of-war; now it is a narrow and shallow channel, not sufficient to float vessels of any size used by the Navy. Large areas of marshes have formed on the east and west ends and on the north side of the island, and the whole appearance indicates a constant and rapid accumulation from the immense deposits of the Delaware river. To raise the surface of this island to a height which would render it safe from the incroachment of high tides, will require a filling of from one to ten feet over the whole area; and if, as has been suggested, a line of wharf front be carried out to the twenty-three feet line, it will involve an additional filling of a space one mile long, and averaging four hundred and eighty-one feet wide and nineteen feet deep. If this space is not filled, then the constant use of dredging machines will be required to maintain a sufficient depth of water to accommodate the vessels of the Navy. To furnish the materials for this immense filling, which will amount in the aggregate to several millions of cubic yards, it is said that an abundant supply can be had from Red Bank, on the opposite side of the river."

Two hundred and nineteen acres and one hundred and fifty-five acres, according to the old arithmetics, used to make three hundred and seventy-four acres. Where, then, are the six hundred acres the gentleman alludes to in his minority report; and where are the six hundred acres of "munificent gift" which the Secretary of the Navy urges upon Congress in his last report? It is a mud flat outside of the island, the recent accretions of the river—ooze, that ooze of which blind old John Milton might have sung as of another ooze just beyond the "burning marle" where was

"Neither sea nor air nor good dry land,
But all these in their pregnant elements or that "Serbonian bog," where great armies might have sunk. This ooze outside of the island is added in the minority report to make out the six hundred acres.
Mixed confusedly,"

And in reference to the land which is inclosed, we have already seen what the commission say.

The water adjacent to the front of the island is but a few feet in depth; at low tide the bottom is entirely exposed.

You have got to get, then, twenty-three feet of water for your vessels to lie in, and to secure that depth will require the additional filling in of a space one mile long, four hundred and eighty-one feet wide, and nineteen feet deep. If this space is not filled in, the constant use of a dredging machine will be required to maintain a sufficient depth of water. The report goes on to say:

"The borings made by the board show that there is a depth of mud and fine sand varying from twenty-five to fifty-six feet in depth, under which is found gravel of good quality, and in sufficient quantities to sustain piles. It is undoubtedly true that no heavy structure can be erected on this island with any probability of safety without resorting to the expensive operation of piling."

"The board is therefore of opinion that, in this particular, New London is vastly superior to League Island."

I have taken the pains to get an engineer to estimate the number of cubic yards in three hundred and seventy-four acres, and it is 5,485,433; and at a dollar per cubic yard, the least price at which the dirt could be purchased, transferred across the river, rehandled, and spread upon the island, it would take more than five million dollars to fill up that island.

But the strongest fact by far is that upon an examination by a scientific process of boring, it is ascertained by the commission—and it is conceded by both branches of the board, majority and minority—that the whole island, or so much of it as is necessary for naval purposes, must be filled to the average depth of thirty-seven feet. The borings showed that the gravel bottom of that island is in some places twenty-five feet below the surface, and at other places fifty-six feet, an average of more than thirty-seven feet. Professor Bache, and the engineer of the Philadelphia yard, and the entire commission, disagreeing in other things, concur in this, that the island must be filled to that average depth.

If you add to the expense of filling the expense of piling, you make an island which, instead of being a gift to the Government, there is hardly money enough in its Treasury to pay for. The gentleman at the head of the Treasury Department has not capacity in his presses to issue greenbacks enough from day to day to pay for the filling and piling, as the work progresses. Millions are required to prepare a foundation.

These facts are conceded by the Secretary, by Admiral Smith, chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and by both branches of the commission.

My friend [Mr. KELLEY] breaks, or attempts to break the force of this argument by asserting in his minority report that "a more accurate examination, such as a really scientific commission would have made," has demonstrated that the report of the original commission was inaccurate, and that the island can be used for Government purposes without being piled.

I ask the attention of the House, of the gentlemen who have examined these reports, and of those gentlemen who have interest enough left in the American Navy and in American navy-yards to decide this question right instead of wrong, with their eyes open instead of blindly; I ask them to consider the testimony by which the gentlemen of the minority of the committee attempt to break the force of the report of this scientific board of officers who examined the question. Who is the witness? Who was the person detailed to make this "accurate examination such as a truly scientific commission should have made?" One George Davidson; and perhaps "not to know him argues one's self unknown." And who is Mr. George Davidson, detailed by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, whose own course has been criticised in the Senate pretty sharply, and in the press of the country, for acting on a board in a matter wherein he had already given an opinion in advance? This Superintendent detailed one George Davidson, of Philadelphia, to examine League Island and report his conclusions; and what are they? The conclusions of Mr. George Davidson as to the scientific results of his observations are precisely identical with those of the original commission. He finds that the alluvial soil attains a certain depth. So did the commission. He finds that then comes a stratum of fine sand. So did the commission. He finds that at the depth of thirty-seven feet, on an average, there comes gravel. So did the commission.

The difference between the commission and the witness is this, and solely this: he gives it as his opinion that the heavy work necessary for the Government may be placed upon the fine sand. Professor Bache, the engineer of Yards and Docks, the admiral of the bureau in charge of Yards and Docks, give it as their opinion that it would not be safe to put them on the sand, but that they must go down to the gravel. That is the only difference between them, and it is a difference of some thirty to fifty feet and of some millions of dollars. And this strictly scientific commission, consisting of one gentleman by the name of Davidson, of Germantown, a ward of Philadelphia, and who gives an opinion which, he says, "in my mind amounts to a conviction," goes for putting the workshops and forges upon the surface of the ooze, while Professor Bache and the engineer who is to build the yard, and the other gentlemen composing the commission, not so strictly scientific, think it unsafe to erect such structures without reaching a solid foundation. That is all; but suppose Congress, having rested the fate of our great Navy on the opinion of one George Davidson, (contradicted by all the other experts,) which, in his mind, "amounts to a conviction," should one day, after expending millions, find these foundations settling, should find your heavy mills and forges, workshops and trip-hammers, all crumbling into one mass of undistinguishable and irredeemable ruin, would it be any satisfaction to know that still, in the mind of Mr. George Davidson, that opinion amounted to a conviction? That is the result of the attempt to break the force of the scientific commission by introducing the testimony of Mr. Davidson.

I do not know but that I ought in fairness to add here that the minority of the committee has brought up another witness to support this view. He is a gentleman named Lewis Taws—of Philadelphia, of course. His testimony is so peculiar that I think the House should have the benefit of it. He says:

"PHILADELPHIA, March 29, 1864.

"DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 28th reached me at my house in Germantown too late for an answer by return mail. I hope I may still be in time, if my opinion can be of any use in establishing the fact that League Island is a proper place to locate a navy-yard for the general purposes of our Government."

He received the letter to which he refers on the 28th, and he hopes that in the morning of the 29th he may be still in time to secure to Philadelphia this inestimable boon of the great naval site of the country. This is one of a class of witnesses that my friend [Mr. DAWES] would hardly characterize as a slow witness. He goes on to say:

"In visiting the place for the first time with any view to an examination, I have no hesitation in saying"—

Of course such a witness would have no hesitation—

"from my experience in the location of our present establishment at Port Richmond that no difficulty will be found for the proper foundations for machinery or buildings at League Island."

This witness, who has an establishment at Port Richmond, ten miles off, asseverates here that, from his experience at Port Richmond, he has no hesitation in saying that the Government can safely put works at League Island, ten miles off. He goes on to add what the character of those works are, and closes with a foot note, which, like the postscript of a lady's letter, is the most important part of his testimony:

"I should have said that my buildings for boiler and smith shops stand on gravel foundation, running from five to ten feet toward the river."

So this witness, the question being whether you may safely put the Government buildings on sand instead of gravel, gives his testimony that they may be safely put upon sand, because his works, ten miles off, are put upon gravel. And well might the honorable gentleman, having a dim suspicion that the testimony was liable to exception, interpolate a picture of a steam anvil as a place for the mind to pause upon, before it arrives at the consideration of the next branch of the subject.

Now, while I am here upon that picture, I might as well say this, because the Secretary of the Navy in his annual report has alluded to that very picture. I do not know whether or not he made the reference by way of advertisement of the artist. If he did, in my opinion the picture is as valuable as the advertisement. But the Secretary has alluded to the fact that League Island is the best place for a naval station because "percussive machinery" can be put with better advantage upon sand than upon ground or stone. Now what is "percussive machinery?" A trip-hammer. How much space does that take? We have the scale upon the picture, and I have taken the trouble to measure that scale. It takes precisely fifteen feet. So that in order to have an elastic bedding of fifteen feet for a trip-hammer, you must take six hundred acres of ooze and mud and fill it in. And to do that you must throw away the best place upon this continent for a naval station, in order that your elastic machinery, as is alleged, may in fifteen feet of digging nowhere find rock. When I come to that part of the subject I shall show conclusively that the soil at New London is free from rock, consists of loam and gravel, and is remarkably adapted for all the uses of a yard. So much for the topography of League Island.

And now I undertake to say that that is the least objection to it. I undertake to say that the obstructions from ice in the Delaware river, the difficulty from the inadequate depth of the water in that river, its distance from the sea, each of them is a still stronger objection to it than the one just disposed of. The great argument that is urged is that it is a place of security for your vessels. So are the Alleghany mountains a place of security. But it would not be the part of wisdom in the House or in the Department to make a station for iron-clads there. And I can show that it would be almost as impossible for iron-clad vessels to get to sea in times of emergency from League Island as from the Alleghany mountains. The obstruction from ice at this point in the Delaware river is so formidable as to be insuperable. And the testimony comes from such a variety of sources, from witnesses so credible, so numerous, and so scattered, and from times when it was nobody's interest to manufacture testimony, that no man can discredit it. And the honorable gentleman has not undertaken even to meet it, except by saying that the force of that objection has been greatly exaggerated, not attempting at all to deny the fact.

The force of this difficulty can hardly be exaggerated; it is very strongly urged by the Secretary of the Navy himself. I refer to the obstruction from ice. It is strongly stated by the commission that originally examined it. There was presented to the committee, while they were examining this question, a list, and a long list, of vessels, taken from the records of the port wardens' office in Philadelphia, that within the past few years had been entirely destroyed by the ice. We found, from an examination of the records of the Corn Exchange, in Philadelphia, that the arrivals at the port of Philadelphia for the winter months were, upon an average, five hundred and two per month, while, for the summer months, they averaged thirty-five hundred per month—a rate of increase, I think, for the summer over the winter months of about six hundred per cent. I may not be precisely accurate in that statement, but gentlemen can turn to it in the report. Whatever the precise figures may be, there was an immense diminution of the coastwise and foreign arrivals at that port in the winter months as compared with the arrivals in the summer months, showing how the commerce of the country regarded that obstruction.

Senator RIDDLE—I do not know whether it is parliamentary to name a distinguished Senator from Delaware in the other Chamber—testified before the committee as a witness who had no bias outside of Delaware, certainly, that he himself had known the Delaware river to be frozen solid at League Island, and had driven across it himself in his sleigh. And he also stated what ought to be known to this House, and perhaps practiced as an example by some, that if he himself were a member of the Pennsylvania delegation he could not in conscience vote for this scheme—he himself being a distinguished engineer. Admiral Gregory laid testimony before the committee that he himself nearly lost the Raritan there a few years ago, from ice; and while the gentleman [Mr. KELLEY] was denying the difficulty from ice, and while I, in a humble way, though as ably as I could, was asserting it, while we were discussing this precise question in committee, the Government gunboat Galena, in attempting to go to sea, solved the question by being herself cut through by ice, and being compelled to be towed, almost in a sinking condition, to Fortress Monroe. The difficulty in this respect was so striking that the great coal-carrying lines of Pennsylvania felt compelled a few years ago to alter the location of their coal depots, and passing by League Island went down the river forty miles, I think, in the neighborhood, at any rate, of Chester or New Castle, and gave as a reason, in their published statement to their stockholders, that it was for the purpose of avoiding the delay, danger, and difficulty from ice. And there was laid before the committee the testimony of a civil engineer in the interest of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, who had been employed by them to investigate this precise site to see whether it was adapted for their purposes. He says:

"You will perceive that the face of League Island is subjected to the full force of the flood tide from the long reach in the river, extending southwestwardly, the effect of which has been, as represented by the statements of those most familiar with our river, and its winds, currents, and bars, to pile up the drifting ice upon the entire island shore-line; and, indeed"— he adds, (and the gentleman cannot discredit the testimony of a Pennsylvania witness, an engineer at that,)—

"I have before me evidence to the effect that in all times of obstruction by ice vessels can be brought with much less difficulty through the Horseshoe channel than to League Island. It may be stated that an ice-guard could be constructed that would relieve the front from the driving ice of the flood tide, but the effect of such breakwater would be to cause deposits within the surface affected, thus subjecting you to a continued and heavy expenditure for dredging."

And upon that report the company abandoned the project.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House whether such a site, in such a river, as I hope I shall have an opportunity to show the House by and by, in the further progress of this debate, is a place for a great naval station? It is well known that at a naval station vessels are constantly going into and out of commission. They come from abroad, and must have a broad front to lie in while awaiting orders or repairs. They must lie in the stream, and the stream is the channel, because there is not sufficient depth of water out of the channel. There they must lie, anchored in the channel, subject to the obstruction of fast ice, and danger from floating ice, at anchor, to be cut through by a downward tide running at the rate of four miles an hour, and an upward tide running back at the rate of three miles an hour.

Gentlemen will remember that the length of the river is such that the ice passes down with one tide to be returned by another, because the length of the river is such that it does not go to the sea; and the experience of the commerce of the world is that, in that river, the ice goes down with one tide and is brought back by another, and so goes dashing everything in its path. I ask you, gentlemen, whether this is the place for your great naval station.

There is a difficulty as insuperable as this in the depth of the river. We had this matter before us. We examined it very minutely by the charts furnished by the Coast Survey department; and it is not denied, it will not be denied upon this floor, that at a point in the Delaware river, immediately below League Island, there is a depth of but eighteen feet of water; that at mean low tide you have in the Delaware river, at that point, but eighteen feet of water, but nineteen feet at Wilmington, nineteen and a half at New Castle, and varying at points down the river at some four or five bars of that description. Now, is this the place for a great naval station?

Mr. Speaker, we are to-day upon the very threshold of naval architecture. The revolution effected within the last ten years by the introduction of steam ceased to be wonderful, viewed in the light of that revolution that was effected by the introduction of iron for the mailing and armature of vessels. Who can cast the horoscope of the future, and doubt that within a few years naval architecture and naval warfare will disclose new problems which are now hidden to the eye of man? And who shall doubt that within this decade vessels will be built drawing twenty-five and thirty feet of water, just as now in England and France there are built large sea-going cruisers drawing twenty-five and twenty-seven feet of water? Donald McKay, a name foremost among the shipbuilders of our time, informed the committee that England and France were already deepening their docks for the reception of vessels drawing thirty feet and over. And the testimony of one of the most eminent of our naval constructors (Mr. Delano) was positive "that it was indispensable to a first-class naval station to have at least twenty-five feet of water at low tide"—seven feet more than the Delaware.

Yet my friend, who makes light of this objection, says that you can place the great naval station of the country for all time at a point where there is a depth of only eighteen feet of water, because we shall not build any of these "monsters" of the ocean. Who has told him that? How can he know it? We have built nineteen monsters already that draw over twenty feet of water. They are upon the catalogue of the Navy to-day. And nineteen of the most efficient steamers of the Navy draw from twenty to twenty-three feet of water. I have not time to give their names—they are spread out in the report of the majority of the committee. There is not one of them, sir, that can go to League Island or return without waiting for the rise of the tide. They could not pass the bars without waiting for the five feet rise by the tide. They can neither get to or from League Island except at high tide.

Mr. Speaker, shall we put the naval yard, the greatness of which has been so eloquently alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and by which we are to wrest the trident of the seas from Neptune—shall we put it at a place where vessels drawing over eighteen feet of water cannot go to sea except by waiting for the rise of the tide?

It is claimed by the gentleman in his report that the Wabash went to sea from the Philadelphia navy-yard, and that she draws twenty-three feet of water. So she did. I have the statement of her captain that it took fifty hours to get her to the breakwater from the yard at Philadelphia on account of being compelled to wait at every bar until the rise of the tide enabled her to pass. Even then, sir, she dragged the bottom all of the time. The Wabash was then going to Port Royal to join in the attack which elevated the name of Du Pont to the roll of our naval heroes, and that great commander had to wait for this finest vessel of his fleet, as she was fifty hours in getting from Philadelphia to the mouth of the river.

I have, in a work called "Armored Vessels," published by order of Congress and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, a statement in reference to the New Ironsides, one of the most formidable mailed vessels in the Navy. She was built at the Philadelphia navy-yard, and was four days getting to the mouth of the river. That fact appears at large upon page 31 of the book I have indicated. The Sangamon, the Patapsco, and the Lehigh, three iron-clads, went to sea from Philadelphia, under tow of steamers, and were two days in getting to the capes. Yet this is the place for the repair and safe-keeping of the iron-clads which are to be the protection of our harbors and cities against foreign attack! It is admitted that this is the only service to which they can be applied, because we know at last, after much popular misapprehension, there is not one of them that has efficiency as an ocean steamer. So far they are simply floating batteries, to be put before cities on the coast and for harbor defense. These iron-clads, according to the gentleman and the Secretary of the Navy, ought to be placed one hundred miles from the ocean for security.

From a point so remote from the scene of their operations they could not get into the presence of a hostile fleet upon the coast sooner than four days through a channel which he admitted to be tortuous, (and I thank him for the admission,) with a tide running down freighted with obstructions. This type of vessels have but feeble motive power of their own, averaging a speed of only five miles an hour, scarcely enough to stem the tide of the Delaware, some having made seven and seven and a half, but mainly on trial trips. These vessels are unwieldy and unmaneuverable, they mind their rudder with the least fidelity, they have less deck room, and of all types of vessel require plain sailing, open sea room, and favorable conditions for either service or for safety. Such, sir, is the class of vessel which it is proposed to put up this tortuous stream, one hundred miles from the ocean, their object being to protect New York, the harbors of the Atlantic, and our seaboard cities at a moment of danger from hostile attack; and the excuse is that these invulnerable vessels must be put in a place of absolute security.

Let me read from the report of Captain Turner, of the New Ironsides, page 76. He says:

"You will, however, have observed how correct my representation was, that this ship could not be depended upon in a tide-way, and how unmanageable she became, compelling the pilot to order the anchor to be let go twice in order to avoid grounding, which would have involved the loss of the ship."

Captain Drayton, of the iron-clad Passaic, reports, page 33, as follows:

"Owing to the peculiar form of the vessel aft, the rudder has no power except through the water thrown on it by the propeller, and then only when it is going at full speed; when the engine is stowed down all means of direction seem to cease. This might become serious in a narrow channel, or one with sharp turns."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish the House would let me conclude now what I have to say. I have not troubled the House since I have been a member of it, nor shall I trouble them often, and I am charged by the committee with the duty of laying the whole subject before the House. I think it is due to me that I shall be allowed to proceed. As I have charge of the bill I will give ample opportunity for debate before demanding the previous question.

There was no objection, and Mr. BRANDEGEE was allowed to proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. These are some of the objections which occurred to the committee and induced them to reverse their first impressions in favor of the site on the Delaware. They seemed to the committee to be not only formidable but insuperable. It seemed to us that the soil at that place was of such a character as to afford a strong reason, if there was no other site suggested, why Congress should not listen for a moment to the argument in favor of adopting that locality. There was such an array of testimony before the committee in reference to the obstruction from ice, and this difficulty was of so alarming a character and so undoubted in its existence, that the committee considered the objection insurmountable. And the nature of that stream is such that any excavations which are made are filled up immediately. It is shown in the report of Professor Bache, in reference to the survey of that stream, that the channel has shifted more than two miles, opposite New Castle, during the last ten years. The fact that this place was so remote from the point of anticipated attack in time of war, and the fact that the peculiar construction of every vessel for which the yard was designed was such that they could not easily be got to the ocean or to the yard; the fact that all iron vessels must be towed to and from sea at an expense, as was represented from the highest authority, of $1,000 the round trip, amounting to a very large annual expenditure; these and other considerations, both of economical and natural disadvantages, forced the committee to the conclusion that this site was totally inadmissible.

Mr. Speaker, the committee, after having examined other places, and after having made a personal examination, directed their attention to the site proposed at New London. I shall not go into a lengthy or elaborate statement of the advantages that obtain at that place. I believe it is well known to every member of this House that its advantages as a harbor are admitted and unrivaled. It must be in the recollection of many here that in their school-boy geographies it was laid down as one of the elements almost that New London harbor was one of the best in the world.

However that may be, it was in proof before the committee that from the earliest period the attention of the Government and the naval authorities had been directed to that harbor, its advantages, its capacity, and its great depth of water from the ocean, that depth being twenty-seven feet at the shallowest point, and that at only one place, all other depths being over thirty feet. The great practical advantage of vicinity to the ocean, and yet sufficiently removed therefrom as to be easily defensible against hostile attack; its contiguity to the great labor system of New England and the timber adapted for ship-building, said to be the best in the country; these considerations, when examined, strongly challenged the attention of the committee, as they had for years the best naval minds of the country.

I have heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania almost exhaust the statistics of the census reports in showing the immense amount of capital and skill invested in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania in the arts of labor. I do not propose to deny his assertion at all. It is not a part of my policy to deny any advantages which obtain as to that site. No doubt there is more skilled labor in Philadelphia than in the whole State of Connecticut. I rejoice at her prosperity; it is a pride to me as well as to him. But the question is, and is alone, can there be enough labor concentrated at New London to supply the wants of this establishment? And who believes that in immediate contiguity to the workshops of New England, hive of busy brains and busy arms, there would be any dearth of labor where capital sought its employment? The board of scientific men met that question, and they concluded that there can be no doubt but that an adequate amount of labor for the purposes of the Government can be obtained at that point; which taps every manufacturing village of New England.

I come now to the consideration of two points, and with the consideration of those two I shall close what I have to say at this time, which have been urged against New London. Those are the absence of fresh water, and the alleged indefensibility of that point against hostile attack. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] compliments me with his attention, I hope he will answer me in the argument which I make upon these points, if he can. In regard to the first point, I undertake to say that the necessity and advantage of fresh water have been greatly exaggerated by the friends of the site in the Delaware river. But little is yet known in this country on the subject of the relative action of fresh and salt water upon iron bottoms. We are in the infancy of an iron navy. We have just commenced building such vessels. We have been so much in the sphere of action, the necessities of our position have driven us so much to practice constant in-exorable action that we have not had time to experiment much upon such matters or to find time to theorize. England has been for a century speculating and experimenting upon this precise subject, and what is the result? I admit all the science the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] possesses, and he has brought into his report much more, culled from the report of British associations, and it runs through ten or fifteen pages of his report. But what is the result to which they have arrived? That the prejudicial action of clear sea water upon iron bottoms for one hundred years is the two hundred and fifteen thousandth part of an inch. The prejudicial action of fresh water is twofold, first from oxidation, and secondly from the attachment of crustacea and other marine attachments to the iron bottom. If I state aright, the result of the tables is nearly inappreciable; but whether it be so or not, I shall undertake to show upon the highest authority that it does not affect iron bottoms in New London harbor. The prejudicial effect of marine attachment is very serious—not less so than the gentleman has stated—to the motive power and efficiency of a vessel.

In one hundred years, then, according to the experiments of England, which are the best lights we can have, the rusting of an iron bottom is the two hundred and fifteen thousandth part of an inch. If my friend's lease of life were as long as that, or if the deterioration of the human system were as slow as that, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there would not be much use for life insurance offices. In one hundred years it is the two hundred and fifteen thousandth part of an inch. If our iron-clad navy lasts as long as that in clear salt water, the scale upon the surface will hardly pay for the one hundred miles of navigation up the Delaware.

Now there is an injury, and a very serious one, growing out of the attachment of marine plants and of marine animals. In southern seas they attach with a marvelous rapidity, and to a degree almost beyond belief; and they destroy or seriously impair the efficiency of an iron or of an iron-plated steamer. They do not, however, attach in any great degree to wooden hulls. There is no doubt that these barnacles, these algae, these sea-worms, these crustacea, of whatever species or genera, do lose their life in fresh water, and that the marine plant loses its life in fresh water. I assert, however, without fear of contradiction, that a condition of things does exist, from whatever cause, speculate on it as you please, summon up philosophy as you may, in the waters of New London, which destroys these crustacea, be they animal or vegetable.

If gentlemen have done me the honor to read the report of the Naval Committee they will have seen that the river Thames, on which the city is located, is a fresh-water stream—a very short one, to be sure—straight, and very deep, and that it is fresh to a point opposite the proposed site of the yard. There it meets the waters of New London harbor, and a brackish state of the water obtains. In that precise water, upon testimony which cannot be discredited, upon the testimony of Benjamin Silliman—a name known in this House and to the country; I might add, known where the English language is known—who himself examined the very site, crustacea do not exist. They are destroyed when brought into contact with those waters. The testimony of that eminent geologist and savant of this country is confirmed by the united testimony of every shipmaster in New London.

Some of them are known to gentlemen on the other side and some of them to gentlemen on this side—such men as Williams and Havens, Barnes and Williams, Frink and Prentiss, and others, whose business it has been to chase the leviathan of the seas around the Arctic circle. They have established this very fact, that the barnacles, the sea-worms, the crustacea, do not exist, and cannot live in the waters of New London harbor. The ship-timber men, the pile-drivers, the owners of wharves, all unite in testifying to that fact. The gentleman [Mr. KELLEY] has attempted to discredit the fact without producing a particle of evidence, but on a visionary theory of his own, that the Atlantic ocean pours its resistless tide into the Thames river, and drives the fresh water back up the river. The theory is ingenious enough if it were not met by the fact that Long Island and Fisher's Island lie across the harbor, and that those sounding waves of the Atlantic, of which the gentleman speaks in still more sounding phrase, are dashed upon "old Long Island's seagirt shore, and wash the beach at Rockaway" instead of into the harbor of New London.

The truth is, and the fact is testified to so that the committee did not for a moment doubt it, that this objection does not obtain in our waters; and further proof of it is that the whaling vessels that come from the Arctic circle and lie at our docks lose within two days their barnacles and the crustacea which attach to them.

Mr. L. MYERS. With the permission of my friend, I would like to ask him whether the vessels he speaks of were iron-clad?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My friend, I hope, feels a glow of satisfaction in learning that they were not. One thing more has been urged against New London, its want of defensibility. If the House should be patient while I address myself to that branch of the subject, I will then relieve it from the further sound of my voice.

It is urged that the site in the Delaware river is thoroughly defensible. Perhaps it is, and perhaps it is not. But the shortest path to League Island, by an enemy, is not by the Delaware, though it may be the only path for us. It is not beyond the recollection of those who remember the history of our revolutionary war, that the enemy passed into Chesapeake bay, landing at Elkton, and flanked Philadelphia and took it, and held it for five months. I might here say, with reference to the obstructions which are relied upon as the chief defenses of the Delaware river, that what is good for defense is good for offense. And if the Delaware river can be obstructed at a certain point to prevent the entrance of an enemy's fleet, can anybody give me any reason why the enemy cannot obstruct the entrance at the mouth of the bay by chains, torpedoes, or other obstructions, and seal up your entire Navy, while they blockade the mouth as tight as in a bottle? How would you get to sea, with the enemy blockading the mouth of such a river as that, and with obstructions to aid the blockade?

It is said, indeed it is rather sung than said, (the Secretary having set the pitch and the whole choir having caught up the refrain,) that New London is indefensible in this, that an enemy's fleet with modern ordnance can lay off a short distance from the mouth of the harbor and shell out the navy-yard if it be established there. The committee have found, and the fact is so, and military gentlemen who were with the committee upon the investigation of that site will attest the fact, that the navy-yard site lies about three and seven eighth miles from the mouth of the river. Beyond the mouth are numerous islands and headlands admirably fitted for earth work batteries. An enemy, then, to lay within shelling distance of the navy-yard, must lay within short range of the plunging fire of the batteries upon these islands and headlands. In other words, to obtain a range of four miles, and do execution, he must himself lay within a hundred yards, or a hundred feet, it may be, of the batteries at the mouth of the harbor.

As to what the judgment of science and of practical minds is upon that subject, I will not follow the gentleman's example and introduce myself as a witness, but that of a board, the competency of whose testimony cannot be questioned for an instant. It is in this report on armored vessels, which contains a great deal of information, and I commend it to the consideration of my friends upon the other side. In the report of the board called together by the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of investigating the very question we are now considering, whether an armored fleet can be kept off by local immovable batteries, this opinion is given on page 3:

"We do not hesitate to express our opinion, notwithstanding all that we have heard or seen written on the subject, that no ship or floating battery, however heavily she may be plated, can cope successfully with a properly constructed fortification. The one is fixed and immovable, and though constructed of a material which may be shattered by shot, can be covered, if need be, by a much heavier armor than the floating vessel can bear, while the other is subjected to the disturbance of wind and waves, and the powerful effect of tide and current."

"The problem proposed by the gentleman is, that a fleet can come from England or the Continent, weighed down by its weight of armor, cross the ocean thus weighed down, and then lay within a few hundred yards' range of batteries at the mouth of a river, and shell out the naval establishment of the country four miles above without danger to itself. That problem would seem to be solved by the opinion just cited, if it had not been before decided by common sense. Added to this would be the presence of your own invulnerable iron-clad Navy, present for its protection with all the modern paraphernalia of torpedoes, rams, and engines of destruction created by the genius of our countrymen, stimulated to its wonderful advancement in all the arts of offense and defense.

The testimony the gentleman has cited for his assertion of the indefensibility of New London, and the only testimony, is that Colonel Ould recently, in a conversation with one of our officers in relation to the exchange of prisoners, asserted that Charleston was untenable from the fire of our batteries there. I must confess that it was with surprise bordering on astonishment that I heard that gentleman, above all others, cite on so important a point as this the testimony of rebels in arms against the Government of the United States. I well recollect at the last session with what wonderful indignation he pounced upon his friend and colleague from the same State [Mr. MILLER] because that colleague had made a charge upon him and had fortified it by the statement of one Robert Tyler, I think, whom my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] denounced as a rebel in arms against the Government, and as unworthy of being cited as witness before this loyal House. And yet the only testimony he offers to the fact he asserts is the testimony of this rebel colonel, and to a fact that is contradicted by the knowledge of every man on this floor, because Charleston is still tenable against the fire of our naval batteries that have been operating against it now for more than a year and a day—the lifetime allowed by the laws.

And the truth is, right here, Mr. Speaker, that the effective range of modern ordnance is at such an elevation—I ask my friend opposite to take notice—as that it cannot apply to naval vessels. To propel a shot to do execution at a range of four or five miles you must elevate your ordnance to thirty or forty degrees. You cannot do that on board of an iron-clad vessel. The very moment that a port-hole is constructed for that purpose, or the hull of a vessel is constructed for that purpose, you have lost her efficiency as an iron-clad; and it is a fact known to every man on this floor that, from first to last, no iron-clad in our country, no iron-clad in Charleston harbor has attempted to throw a shot at that range toward the city of Charleston, for the reason that on board a vessel they could not elevate their guns at such a degree as to make their range effective. With batteries at the mouth of our harbor we could keep at sea four or five miles from shore an enemy's fleet by the very range spoken of.

Now, on this question of defensibility (and with this I shall close) I am willing to leave the case with the testimony of experts. My friend alleges that New London is not only undefended, but indefensible. That is his opinion. His opinion is entitled, I have no doubt, to great weight. I know that he has had some military experience. I recollect very well that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] read here one of the most amusing pieces of military autobiography that I ever heard before a public body, wherein was given the military experience of my friend on that night, I believe either before or after the battle of Gettysburg, (my friend can correct me if I am wrong,) when my military critic lay, in his own language, upon his back, "gazing at the misty, mazy mysteries of the Milky Way." [Laughter.] When, therefore, my friend, relying upon that military experience, sets it up against the judgment of the authorities that are alluded to in the report of the majority of the committee, I must defer to him personally; but I must still claim that, before this House, the judgment of such authorities as we have cited is better than even his judgment.

And, sir, this question of defensibility is one that these lawyers here cannot determine. It is a question that the farmers here cannot determine. It is a question that the debaters here cannot determine. It is intrinsically a question of naval and military science and engineering, and a very uncertain one at the best. What say the military critics upon this question? General Cullen, chief of engineers of the army of the Potomac, who examined the subject with reference to this very question, gave the committee his opinion that no harbor in the United States was more easily defended. Major General George B. McClellan, who, whatever may be said of his capacity to lead an army in the field, history will certainly, with one accord, proclaim as the ablest or one of the ablest engineering officers and military scholars that this country has ever produced—he himself examined this harbor, with precise reference to this very question, with a knowledge of improved ordnance and the revolution in naval architecture, and gave it as his opinion that it was a very eligible place for a naval station.

General Dix, within whose military department the place is, has also made an examination of it with reference to that question. Admiral Stringham also made a similar examination. Commodore Van Brunt, who afterward commanded the Minnesota in that gallant fight that she made for two days against that unseemly monster of the ocean, the first Merrimack, the first iron-clad of which we had knowledge—that monster of whom my classical friend might perhaps truly say, in the language of the poet, "monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum," that shapeless beast upon the waves, wallowing its way to the all but certain destruction of our Navy—he who fought her for two days in his wooden walls, has also given it as his opinion that this is a most eligible site for a naval station, and easily defended. And such was the judgment of Admiral Foote, of Commodore Ringgold, of Admiral Paulding, and that sound, sensible commander in the Navy to-day, who has charge of the entire iron-clad department of this country at the Brooklyn navy-yard, Admiral Gregory. So that, on the question of defensibility, I must wait until I see better authorities arrayed against such a multitude of witnesses as these, whose reputation is not inferior to that of any others in this or any other lands.

Mr. Speaker, this place is offered to the Government. I heard something fall from my friend, which I was sorry to hear, about land speculation. My friend generally speaks pretty clearly, and I think I have not misunderstood him. My friend has intimated that there is a land speculation at New London. He intimates on this floor that which he did not intimate in committee, and which was proved before him, in the committee, to be a gross slander upon the constituents whom I represent. It may not be parliamentary, but it is true, nevertheless; and I do not propose to abate anything of the declaration.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. It was argued, if it be proper to mention the matter, very elaborately before the committee that the establishment of an institution which would require more labor than there were people in the town must lead to inordinate speculation in land. You cannot, sir, double the population of a village without creating speculation in town lots. It is not possible to do so.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to discuss what has occurred in committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So I understand; and that sin is not upon my skirts.

Mr. Speaker, there is a fish which, I believe, is called the cuttle-fish—I am not now able to give the name by which it is known in natural history—and which, after it makes an attack and is pursued, surrounds itself with an inky cloud, and so attempts to escape from the assault which itself has provoked. I make, of course, no application of this fact of natural history to anything which has occurred within the last five minutes. But, sir, when a gentleman on this floor in a speech alludes to land speculation in connection with such a subject, I understand, (I don't know how it seems to other gentlemen,) but I understood an insinuation to be made against the parties proposing it, and to the effect that the Government is in some way to be cheated by these parties, and I did not understand the gentleman to refer to the legitimate increase of a city (which every man has a right to desire) arising from the location of a Government work. It may be that at some of the proposed sites there are harpies who would pick up the land, and interest themselves to make an unconscionable bargain with the Government. I understand that the gentleman does not mean that in reference to New London, by his disclaimer, and there is nothing left to reply to.

Mr. KELLEY. I did not mean that. I know that this land was tendered as a gift to the Government; and I know that the mere doubling of the population of a town suddenly must create land speculations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That, Mr. Speaker, is a legitimate consideration. It naturally follows if there is any speculation in reference to land it is a speculation among themselves, where one man is the loser and another is the gainer, and with which the Government has nothing to do. My friend has taken back what I understood to be the natural inference from his remarks, that there was to be such land speculation as would be to the injury of the Government. I stated before the committee, and I state it now with a full knowledge of the business of that little town, that not a foot, not an inch of real estate or personal property there has changed hands since this subject was mentioned on account of the pending of this question. We always have felt that we have had too just a case to resort to any but fair means. Notwithstanding we had to contend against so great a city as Philadelphia in such a stormy forum as this, we have thought we could make it so clear to the House that they could not fail to see the merits of the case of New London.

I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that we offer you to-day what I believe to be the best natural roadstead on the American continent, admitted by the naval authorities and by a vast majority of naval officers outside of the Department to be such. There is no speculation in the purchase. Connecticut, though small as she is—and I do not propose to allude to her past services or present position; I disclaim all that sort of Bancombe—the State of Connecticut has offered it to you for nothing. You have but to put your hand out and take it. That is all.

The question is now, with such a harbor as that, with such advantages, with soil remarkably adapted for Government works, as the engineer of the yard tells you, almost made to your hand by natural excavation for docks, in a healthful climate, in a genial latitude, because the temperature there is moderated by the Gulf stream, declared by Humboldt to be one of the most healthful spots in America; the question is whether you will refuse the best place for a naval depot for iron-clads that is offered to you for nothing. I beg of this House not to imitate the folly of the Roman emperor who turned away the Sibyl while presenting the leaves upon which the fate of the Roman empire depended. I ask you not to throw away this opportunity for obtaining the best place on the continent for a great naval station.

I ask you to consider it; if not now, to postpone it, that you may look at it more seriously and consider it from day to day, so that you may at last lay broad and deep the foundations of our Navy. You must do it. It is your duty to become a first-class naval Power, and if to-day you recklessly throw away the chance, at some hour when it is too late you will repent at the expense of your national honor and the position you ought to maintain as mistress of the seas. I ask you to pause before you decide, and to decide at last by merits and not by numbers. The action of to-day decides, for the illimitable future, the efficiency of your Navy, it may be, your position as a naval Power. It is at once your duty and your destiny to become a first-class naval nation. Lay, then, the foundations strong and deep, not in shallow waters or upon quicksands, but, seizing these great natural advantages, the want of which France vainly strives to supply by art, accept for the Government a station for that Navy which is yet to ride the mistress of the seas and wring from reluctant England the baton of the ocean.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Connecticut in his closing words speaks for New London, so, I say, argues the Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report just made to the President, in his remarks favoring the location at League Island for a "navy-yard for iron vessels and machinery," that if now the United States loses this generous offer of the city of Philadelphia, gone forever is the opportunity. When I wanted the floor a few minutes ago, it was not that I wished the House to understand that I was about to make a lengthy speech on the subject; not that I desired to advocate League Island because it happened to be located in a portion of the district I am endeavoring to represent, but merely to state, based upon such arguments as I hope to adduce, beginning with the report of the commission to which the gentleman has referred, that I think League Island should be at once accepted, and that the minority report of the Committee on Naval Affairs should be adopted without delay, as recommending the place, of all others, most suited for the purposes of building an iron navy, and as offering reasons unsatisfactory, in my opinion, for the favorable action of the House.

There are several points in the majority report of the commission to which I ask your attention. I am not, Mr. Speaker, about to enter into an investigation of the birthplaces of its members. I do not intend to condescend to make such a small warfare upon worthy officers of the Navy who constituted it as to name for the sake of an argument against their fairness where they were born, but I will take occasion to say that Commodore John Marston, an able and accomplished gentleman, and a near relative of my friend and colleague from the first district of Pennsylvania, came from the State of Massachusetts; and that Commodore Gardiner, an equally meritorious officer, who signed the majority report of the commission, was a native of the State of Maryland. It does not matter to me that Rear Admiral Stringham, whose life has been passed in the Navy to the glory and honor of the country, was reared in the State of New York; nor will I stop to inquire for the birthplace of Engineer Sanger. Philadelphia does claim her honored son, Professor A. D. Bache; but claiming him she does not here or elsewhere impugn the motives of others whose lives have illustrated a conscientious discharge of duty, or attempt to fasten upon them the narrow and selfish argument of locality before country. I wish now to do justice to the members of the commission, and to protest against any remarks tending to reflect upon their action; and to disclaim for them, as I do for myself, any idea of being influenced on this subject otherwise than for the advantage of the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, I throw out of consideration this point of locality in selecting a site for such a navy-yard as the country really wants; but I will make an effort to show the House that the report of the majority of the commission proves almost conclusively, upon all the leading requirements necessary for a naval station for iron-clads, armature, and machinery, that League Island is unsurpassed in the depth and freshness of the waters flowing around it, in its nearness to every article used in building iron vessels, and its defensibility. The gentleman from Connecticut, I think, will, upon reflection, concede at least the latter point, and will not again speak of Philadelphia being outflanked in one of the earlier wars. He must look to the history of our revolutionary struggle, and not forget, when he attempts to undervalue the defenses of the Delaware river, that hostile fleets have visited his favorite harbor, and that armies have marched and fought successfully at his very threshold. He has not told us that New London was outflanked; that Fort Griswold, on Groton Heights, was outflanked. He forgot to state that in September, 1781, a British fleet left the eastern end of Long Island in the evening, and that upon the next morning it appeared in front of New London and almost burnt it to ashes; while at the same time a British army attacked Fort Griswold, took its garrison, after a gallant defense by New England patriots, and after its surrender basely murdered the brave Colonel Ledyard. I am quoting history.

Such was the defensibility of New London. There have been improvements in building fortifications and in constructing vessels of war. Steam and iron have changed the character of attack and defense; but relatively the Delaware river is more capable of withstanding attacks of armies or navies than New London. League Island is further from the ocean by many miles, and the approach of a hostile fleet is almost impossible. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the point of defensibility, and upon it the majority of the commission decides "that the two sites may be regarded as equal." I leave it to the House to say whether they can fail to determine that League Island artificially and naturally can be made unsailable. My opinion is that immense outlays of money will be necessary to put New London in a proper state of defense. But a few miles from the ocean, within range of the gunnery now in use, what, with the continued improvements, will not be done? Five or six miles for projectiles will not secure any fort, while armored ships will in defiance make an attack, and will be secure from danger by the power of steam. Mr. Speaker, I have said that the greatest requisites for the location of a navy-yard for the construction of iron-clads are to be found more fully at League Island than at New London. I will go on further in my endeavor to prove this from the report of the commission.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. JENCKES. I desire to interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and say to him that the final vote on the passage of the bankrupt bill was postponed from last session until to-day. I ask the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and of the House, to take up that matter, and put the bill upon its passage to-day.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 424) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was taken up for action.

Mr. JENCKES. By reason of the postponement, it becomes necessary to make an alteration in the last section of the bill in reference to the time when it shall take effect. I move to amend by striking out the words "1st of September, 1864," and inserting "1st of June, 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to let this bill be postponed till this day week.

Mr. JENCKES. I decline to yield the floor, and I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 56, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—50.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WILLIAMS stated that his colleague, Mr. Moorhead, was detained at home in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. ORTH stated that his colleague, Mr. JULIAN, was confined to his room by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, resumed the floor on the question of the naval depot for iron-clads, but yielded to

Mr. J. C. ALLEN, who moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Certainly.

TAX ON DOMESTIC LIQUORS.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend section five, chapter one hundred and seventy-three, of the laws of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, to increase the tax on whisky to be manufactured.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. It enacts that the act referred to shall be so amended as that there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, on and after July 1, 1864, and prior to December 15, 1864, a duty of $1 50 on each and every gallon, and on and after December 15, 1864, a duty of two dollars on each and every gallon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

NAVY-YARD AT GRAND HAVEN.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the establishment of a navy-yard and naval depot at Grand Haven, in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE HARBOR OF ERIE.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvements in the harbor of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DUTY ON MINERAL COAL.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas under the exhaustive plea of military necessity a new and burdensome system of taxation has been imposed upon the laboring classes and consumers throughout the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, requested to take prompt and efficient means to lessen the sufferings of the industrial classes by reducing the tax on mineral coal, now become one of the prime necessities of life, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Objection was made.

BOUNTY LANDS TO SOLDIERS, ETC.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting a quarter section of land to every soldier, sailor, and marine, whether citizen or alien, who shall have served one year in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war of rebellion; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE HUDSON.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relative to the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the Hudson river, at Albany, in the State of New York, and the establishment of the same as a post route; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ST. LOUIS AND IRON MOUNTAIN RAILROAD.

Mr. BLOW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of the St. Louis and Iron Mountain railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC LANDS TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it would be just and expedient to set apart a portion of the public lands for the benefit of such soldiers of the United States as have been or shall be permanently disabled during the present war, and whose circumstances may require the generous aid of their country; and that the committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill granting to the several States portions of the public lands, the proceeds of which shall be applied to the exclusive benefit of such soldiers, either in founding homes for them in their respective States, or otherwise, as the several State Legislatures may determine; and that the said committee also inquire into the expediency of permitting the several States to apply the proceeds of the public lands granted to them by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, to the same purpose, or to the support and education of the orphan children of such soldiers as have died or shall die in the service of the United States during the present war, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That resolution instructs the committee absolutely to report such a bill. I would suggest to the gentleman to so modify it as to direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of so doing.

Mr. HOLMAN. As to the diversion of the lands which have been appropriated for the purposes of agricultural colleges in the several States, that is to be merely a matter of inquiry. But as to the grant of lands for homes to disabled soldiers in the several States, I have made it imperative, and I would prefer to have it go to the committee in that form.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is the usual practice of the House, I believe, especially at such a time as this, when we have no time for full consideration, not to instruct a committee absolutely to report a bill. I refer to this as a mere matter of courtesy to the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. As the Secretary of the Treasury has referred to the public lands as a matter of considerable importance, in relation to a sinking fund, I must object to the introduction of this resolution at the present time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] too late with his objection?

The SPEAKER. He is too late. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Farnsworth] was in time with his objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must object, unless the resolution is modified as I have suggested.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not press it at this time; I will withdraw it.

OVERLAND CALIFORNIA MAIL.

Mr. DAILY. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas it is charged by Joseph H. Burbank, who was a bidder at the last letting of the overland California mail service, that the late Postmaster General did him gross injustice in this, that he refused or failed to offer him the contract for more than thirty days after he could have easily done so, (when there were only ninety days given to prepare for so large a contract,) and after the Postmaster General did make to said Burbank a direct and explicit offer of said contract, both by telegraph and letter, said Burbank accepted the offer immediately and unconditionally, and at a large expense commenced preparation for the service, but when he sent his agent to Washington fully empowered to formally close up the contract, the late Postmaster General told him that the contract was given to Ben. Holladay: Therefore,

Resolved, That, if not inconsistent with the public service, the Postmaster General be requested to furnish this House with a full statement of all bids and bidders, letters, and telegrams, showing to whom and how the letting of the contract for the overland California mail was made, and the evidences of which may be in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BROOKS. It is not for me to defend the Administration; but it seems to me that the phraseology of that resolution is objectionable.

Mr. BENNET. I must object to the introduction of this resolution until it is so modified as to be addressed to the President or directly to the Postmaster General.

And then, on motion of Mr. B. WOOD, (at twenty minutes past three o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 13, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the credentials of Hon. HENRY B. ANTHONY, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1865; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of Blake, Brothers & Co., bankers in Boston and New York, in which they set forth that they were the owners of certain certificates of indebtedness of the Government of the United States, amounting to the sum of $10,000; that these certificates were lost; that evidence was furnished to the Treasury Department of the loss, but that down to this day they have not received full compensation for the loss. They pray Congress to provide a remedy in their special case, and also by further legislation to protect the interests of persons in such situation. As the questions involved in this petition concern the finances and credit of the country, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg leave to present the petition of the grand and petit jurors of the eastern judicial district of Michigan, praying for additional compensation for their travel and attendance. They complain that the compensation at present allowed by law is not adequate to pay their expenses in attending court, and that they are obliged to pay a large balance out of their own pockets. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I present also the memorial of N. G. Isbell, collector of the port of Detroit, praying relief against the operation of the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, increasing the rate of duties upon imported articles fifty per cent., which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

It was so ordered.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's annual message as relates to our foreign relations, reported a bill (S. No. 356) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia; which was read and passed to second reading.

REVENUE CUTTERS ON THE LAKES.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 350) to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes, direct me to report it back with an amendment, and, as there are reasons for its immediate consideration, I will ask the Senate to act upon it now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to construct or purchase not exceeding six steam revenue cutters for service on the lakes, and appropriate $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for that purpose.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the words "and alter" after the word "purchase."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask for the reading of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, requesting information as to the number of revenue cutters now on the lakes, their efficiency, and the necessity for their increase.

The number of cutters heretofore maintained on the northern lakes was six. They were sailing vessels, and of such build and rig as to prevent their cruising with efficiency. In 1861 five of them were directed to be brought down the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic coast, in the hope that they might be used advantageously in the preventive service. One was left upon the lakes, but found to be worthless, and sold. During the last winter a contract was made with parties to build an efficient steamer for revenue service on Lake Erie, which vessel is so nearly completed that her trial trip has been ordered for to day. This is the only steamer belonging to the Government applicable to revenue purposes on all the lakes.

The necessity, however, for preventing smuggling along our northern frontier, which the Government has satisfactory evidence is carried on to a great extent, induced the Secretary to charter two steamers for temporary service, one on Lake Erie and one on Lake Ontario. One of these vessels was lost on entering the harbor of Cleveland, and the charter of the other has expired and she has gone out of service.

I therefore recommend that authority be given to build or purchase five efficient steam vessels for the use of the revenue department on the northern lakes, which, in addition to the one just completed, will make the number of cutters previously employed.

It is possible that the number here recommended may not all be required. The great length of the coast to be guarded, and in some parts its close proximity to the Canadian shore, demand constant vigilance, and the proper authority should be conferred to meet all contingencies.

It is possible such vessels should be completed and commissioned by the opening of navigation.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if these are to be armed vessels.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that revenue cutters are usually armed with a pivot gun. They are not vessels of war, nor are they armed like naval vessels. They are not in the descriptive words of our treaty with Great Britain. They are usually armed, as I understand, with a light pivot gun, sufficiently powerful to answer the purpose of a revenue cutter, to stop a vessel or anything of that kind; nothing more.

Mr. FOSTER. The reason of my inquiry was that by an arrangement between the Government of the United States and the British Government, if I mistake not, in April, 1817, there were stipulations in regard to the armed forces which the Governments of Great Britain and the United States should have upon the lakes. If these vessels were armed, they would be contrary to the provisions of that arrangement. I made the inquiry simply with a view of understanding the facts.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance considered the arrangement referred to carefully before reporting the bill. I have it now before me. It provides:

"The naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes by His Majesty and the Government of the United States shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is:

"On Lake Ontario, to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and armed with one 18-pound cannon.

"On the upper lakes, to two vessels, not exceeding like burden each, and armed with like force.

"On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel not exceeding like burden, and armed with like force.

"All other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled, and no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed."

Under this arrangement both parties, both the United States and Great Britain, have kept revenue cutters on the lakes. We had six sailing revenue cutters there, but recently they have been inefficient, and within the last year—

Mr. JOHNSON. Were they armed?

Mr. SHERMAN. They were armed, as I have mentioned, with one light pivot gun. Five of them, under the direction of the Secretary, were brought to the sea coast, and found unsuitable for the service there, and the other was sold. This bill simply substitutes steam revenue cutters for sailing revenue cutters. I presume they will be armed in the ordinary way that revenue cutters on the ocean are, with some light arm.

I will state that the necessity for immediate action is that two vessels were chartered during the last summer for service on the lakes; the charter has expired; and the Secretary of the Treasury desires to either purchase or construct vessels, so that they may be ready for service at the opening of navigation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 82) to encourage enlistments, and promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to foreign immigration be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

DEBORAH JONES.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 465. It came to the Senate during the last session, was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and has been reported back. It was my impression that it passed during the last session. It is a very short bill, and there is a short report connected with it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 465) for the relief of Deborah Jones. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Deborah Jones, the widow of the late Captain Ezekiel Jones, of the county of Osceola, New York, upon the pension roll, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, according to the provisions of the act to grant pensions, approved July 14, 1862, which pension is to commence from the 6th of November, 1862.

Mr. FOSTER. A short report accompanies the bill which states the facts. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read it. It appears from the affidavits and other papers accompanying the memorial of the petitioner that the late Captain Ezekiel Jones began recruiting a company for the one hundred and forty-sixth regiment New York volunteers in the month of August, 1862; that he labored incessantly at this duty, and by his over-exertion brought on a fever, with which he was seized on the 5th of October, 1862, and of which he died on the 6th of November following; that he was not mustered into the service of the United States until the 10th of October, and, therefore, although he was technically in the service at the date of his death, and actually, though not technically, in the service when his disease was contracted, his case falls without the provisions of the pension laws. Had he been mustered in five days earlier, or had his system withstood the approach of the disease for five days longer, his widow, the petitioner, would have been entitled to a pension under existing laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 424) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions, which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore, namely:

A bill (H. R. No. 563) in addition to the act respecting quarantine and health laws, approved February 25, 1799, and for the better execution of the third section thereof;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 106) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of certain moneys therein mentioned; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 114) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department building.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The bill (H. R. No. 424) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. FOSTER, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JUAN MIRANDA.

Mr. CARLILE. A bill (S. No. 238) to ascertain and settle certain private land claims in the State of California, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, was, before the adjournment of the last session, made the order of the day for this day. I understand from the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] whom I have consulted, this being a California matter, that he would prefer the bill should go over and be made the special order for some subsequent day of the session; and, with the approbation of the Senate, I suggest, if it meets the views of the Senator from California, that the 10th day of next month be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I am informed this morning by a citizen of that State, deeply concerned in the passage of this bill, that he comes here with important facts and papers that relate directly to it, which were not before the Senate last year, when it was considered, and have never been before the committee which reported it. For this reason, I prefer at present, if the Senator will consent, that the bill be taken up and recommitment to the Committee on Public Lands, before which committee this gentleman, and indeed both parties to the case can appear, and by which it can be reexamined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on taking up the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. While I am up, I desire to say to the Senator, and to the Senate, that I feel upon this question that I have performed nearly my whole duty in the premises. The Legislature of the State that I in part represent here passed resolutions against the passage of the bill, and those resolutions were presented, and I caused them to be read to the Senate, and in all other respects I feel that I have executed my duty in the premises; but in view of the new facts that are to be presented, I think it is the duty of the Senate to refer the bill, and my own duty to move that it be referred again to the committee, so that it may be fully examined and reported upon again.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree with the Senator from California. No doubt he is right in saying that there are papers before the Senate now which were not before the committee on the former occasion, and that the bill had better be referred back to the Committee on Private Land Claims or the Committee on Public Lands, that the whole matter may be again examined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the Senator from Virginia moves that the bill be postponed—

Mr. CARLILE. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. TEN EYCK, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 13, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a report of the State Department, transmitting returns of United States collectors relative to the relief and protection of American seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXTRA PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House, explanatory of his reasons for failing to execute a resolution of the House adopted on the last day of the last session, relative to additional compensation of employés of the House; which was read, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RECORDING VOTES ON BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the passage of the bankrupt bill, on which the vote was taken yesterday.

Leave was granted; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, voted in the negative.

Messrs. STILES, ANCONA, MILLER of Pennsylvania, KNAPP, LAW, and A. MYERS, obtained similar leave, and voted in the negative.

Messrs. SLOAN, WILDER, and STARR, obtained similar leave, and voted in the affirmative.

POLITICAL RELATIONS OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution declaring that the State of Louisiana may resume its political relations with the Government of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SELECTIONS OF LAND IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to confirm to the State of California selections of land made in part satisfaction of donations by Congress; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AID TO RAILROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. COLE, of California, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

MINING DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COLE, of California, asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to establish a Mining Department, and moved its reference to a select committee on mining, to consist of seven members.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no objection to the subject being taken under consideration by a special committee, if there can also be referred an inquiry as to the modes and means of obtaining a revenue from the mines, as well as the whole question of mining. If the whole subject can go to a special committee I think it should have the consideration of the House. We ought not to incur expenditures without obtaining some revenue.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from California to send it to the Committee on Public Lands. What is the use of a reference to a special committee when we have a standing committee on the same subject? But I am opposed to the whole scheme.

Mr. COLE, of California. There is no purpose in this bill to take charge of the mineral lands, but only to promote the development of the minerals, and a special committee should have charge of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is not before the House.

PRINTING OF TREASURY REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and under the rules referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That fifteen hundred copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents, and one hundred and fifty copies of the estimates of appropriations be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

NAVY-YARD AT MILWAUKEE.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the establishment of a navy-yard and naval depot at Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

POLITICAL RELATIONS OF LOUISIANA—AGAIN.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which a joint resolution, introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] declaring that the State of Louisiana may resume its political relations with the Government of the United States was referred this morning to the Committee on the Judiciary. I only ask that the motion be entered. I do it for the purpose of having the resolution referred to the committee on the rebellious States, where I think it properly belongs.

Mr. ELIOT. I would say in reply that there has been a bill on the same general subject already referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it is highly desirable that examination should be had by that committee of a matter of so much importance. It is one of the standing committees of this House. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being, on a division, only eighteen in the affirmative.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded tellers on the nays and yeas.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. J. C. ALLEN and ELIOT were appointed.

The yeas and nays were ordered, the tellers having reported thirty-three in the affirmative, more than one fifth of those present.

The question was taken, and there was a tie vote—yeas 66, nays 66, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Highy, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knox, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Spalding, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Wilson, and Windom—66.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Edson, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Julian, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Townsend, Wadsworth, Williams, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Driggs, Dumont, Fenton, Frank, Grider, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, McKinney, Middleton, Morrison, Nelson, Norton, Perry, Pruyn, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—50.

The SPEAKER recorded his vote in the negative, so that the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to state to the House my reason for moving to reconsider. It embraces a subject which, I think, properly belongs to the committee on rebellious States, as well in reference to Louisiana as any other of the rebellious States. I hope, therefore, the House will reconsider its vote of this morning.

Mr. ELIOT. In this connection I desire simply to say that, when I selected the Committee on the Judiciary as the proper committee to which this resolution should be referred, it was done for two reasons: first, because as a standing committee it seemed to be the proper one for an examination of this question; and, secondly, because a bill, looking to the same subject, had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I had no reason to suppose, nor have I any reason to believe, that the resolution will receive any other treatment than the kindest at the hands of the committee on the rebellious States; nor have I any reason to believe that there are gentlemen upon that committee who would be opposed to the principles of the resolution. I am as well satisfied to have the resolution referred to the committee on the rebellious States as to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was determined in my own mind to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary for the reasons I have stated. As I have no objection, I therefore hope the House will at once refer the matter to the committee proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question recurred on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question recurring on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary,

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved that it be referred to the committee on the rebellious States.

The motion to refer to a standing committee of the House having preference, it was first put and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was then referred to the select committee on the rebellious States.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VOTES ON THE BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. YEAMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I yesterday voted distinctly in the negative on the passage of the bankrupt bill, as some of the clerks distinctly remember. My vote is not recorded, and I ask that it may be done.

No objection being made, the vote was recorded as requested.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I was detained from the House yesterday by sickness in my family. I ask consent to have my name recorded in the affirmative on the bankrupt bill.

No objection being made, the vote was recorded as requested.

TAX ON MINERAL COAL.

Mr. CHANLER asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and is hereby, requested to take prompt and efficient means to reduce the tax on mineral coal, which bears with undue severity on the laboring classes throughout the country, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will modify his resolution so as to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of doing so, I will not object.

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly I will.

Mr. STEVENS. If the resolution absolutely instructs the committee, I object.

The resolution being modified as requested, was received, and adopted by unanimous consent.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIME IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill provides that the second section of said act shall be so amended as to provide that every person duly convicted of manslaughter, or any assault with intent to kill, shall be sentenced to imprisonment at labor for the first offense, for a period not less than two nor more than eight years; and for a second offense, not less than six nor more than fifteen years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL DEPOT ON THE LAKES.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be appointed by the Speaker a select committee of seven, to whom, during this session, shall be referred all motions, resolutions, and petitions relative to a naval depot on the lakes, whose duty it shall be to select the most suitable site on the lakes for such naval depot, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING and Mr. STEVENS objected.

GOODS IN PUBLIC STORES.

Mr. STEVENS asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from the public stores.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is not before the House.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the House No. 465, for the relief of Deborah Jones; also, that the Senate had passed a bill (No. 350) to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the regular order of business.

NAVAL DEPOT FOR IRON-CLADS.

The House resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 536) authorizing a survey at and near New London, Connecticut, and the establishment of a navy-yard for iron-clad vessels thereat, the pending question being upon the following substitute proposed by Mr. KELLEY:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the city of Philadelphia a title to League Island on behalf of the Government, if said title be perfect, and to establish thereat a navy-yard and depot for the construction, docking, and repair of iron, iron-clad, and other vessels.

The SPEAKER stated that Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, was entitled to the floor for twenty-three minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the few remarks I made yesterday were on the point of the indefensibility of the harbor of New London and the entire defensibility of the Delaware river, especially at League Island. I shall endeavor to-day to prove, almost entirely from the report of this commission, that League Island is better in every respect, as a location for a navy-yard for the construction of iron-clads, than any other point which has been named for that purpose before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House.

Mr. Speaker, let me call your attention and that of the House for a moment to the report of the Secretary of the Navy. I shall then go on and endeavor to establish my view of this case from the report of the naval commission. This House, I know, is ready to do justice to the integrity, the patriotism, and the unselfishness of the Secretary of the Navy. He, I am proud to say, stands above any local prejudices, and is influenced only by a desire to subserve the efficiency of the naval service, and to do whatever may lie within his power to bring us out of this war with a naval power sufficient for any purposes of any war hereafter to come upon us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be urged that Philadelphia has any selfish view in desiring to have this naval station within her municipal limits. She made the tender to the Government of this territory of League Island after it had been suggested by the Secretary of the Navy in his earlier reports that a naval station for iron-clads was necessary. It was made not with any view of promoting the interests of private speculators; it was not made at the promptings of private interests; it was a noble and disinterested offer of that great metropolis to the Government of the United States for the purpose of having this navy-yard established in the location best fitted for it. I believe the people of New London afterwards tendered a portion of territory of that city or in the neighborhood of it for the same purpose. No gentleman upon this floor has protested against that. I say again that I cannot consent to the question of locality controlling the minds of members. I cannot consent that we shall bring into this House the issue of where the members of this commission came from, or where the interests of the members of the Naval Committee might lead them. I stand above all that, and I hope the House will decide this measure solely upon its merits, and not in view of the interests of any section of the country.

Upon turning to a paragraph in the recent report of the Secretary of the Navy it will be seen that it is not the design of the Navy Department to recommend that any new navy-yard shall be located, much less that it is the intention of the Department to locate a new yard where none already exists. This is a question of extending a navy-yard, not of creating a new one. Congress is only asked to authorize the transfer of the Philadelphia navy-yard from its present location to League Island for the purpose of erecting there a naval station for building iron-clads. It is a question of substitution and transfer, and not one of a new yard, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is well aware of that fact. It is not remarkable that the Secretary of the Navy, who knows what the wants of the Navy are, and is constantly in consultation with those who know its requirements, should have recommended the selection of this location at League Island in the river Delaware. Almost from the date of his first report down to this time he has urged upon Congress the actual necessity of establishing such a naval depot, and has not wavered from his earliest impressions as to the proper site for its establishment. I take it for granted that he has examined thoroughly the majority and minority reports of the naval commission; that he has not overlooked the majority and minority reports of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that from other testimony he has year by year become more fully confirmed in his opinion that League Island is the desirable locality.

But, Mr. Speaker, on page 13 of the report of this commission a proposition in reference to depth of water is discussed. That point has been argued by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] very extensively. The majority decides that the depth of water at both places—New London and League Island—is sufficient for the accommodation of any vessel of our Navy. My colleagues, [Mr. KELLEY and Mr. MOOREHEAD,] in their very convincing minority report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, tell you of this abundant supply of water at League Island. The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report which has been so much referred to, tells you also of its twenty-three feet of depth of water. What better testimony than this does the House need? We do not pretend to say here that the Delaware river is the deepest river on the continent. Nor do I pretend to assert that it can be navigated a distance of eighty or ninety miles as quickly and easily as the five or six miles that intervene between New London and the ocean. No one makes such an allegation before the House.

But we tell you that now, when steam and iron are driving wooden and sailing vessels out of the Navy, a distance of seventy or eighty miles of navigation is of very little practical consequence. I say I will not argue that that distance can be navigated as quickly as a distance of five or six miles; but I do argue that, in view of its greater defensibility, League Island is a better location for a naval depot than New London. I have heard, and I believe, that a high officer in the engineering department of the Government—an officer at the very head of that department, if not its very head—after having looked over the majority and minority reports of the Naval Committee, and having investigated the subject, has stated to a distinguished member of Congress that New London harbor cannot be defended unless by the construction of a line of defenses extending five or six miles continuous and unbroken to the ocean. Let us, therefore, come down calmly and reasonably to the facts of the case, and not allow ourselves to be turned away from them by any side questions as to local interests.

I will now pass to another point, and will yet ask the attention of members to the report of the commission, the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the report of my colleagues from the minority of the Naval Committee, and the report, in some respects, of the majority of that committee. They will satisfy the House, I am sure, that the Navy Department has taken the proper view of the case in endeavoring, within the last three years, to locate the naval depot for iron-clads at a place where there is no salt water. Well, Mr. Speaker, as to the freshness of the water. The majority of the commission on this subject say that the supply of fresh water at League Island is unquestionable. The report speaks of New London having an abundant supply near it—a mile north; but the shores of League Island are washed by fresh water. It is at the confluence of two streams, the Delaware river and the Schuylkill river, having also at the north of it a channel two hundred feet in width.

Then look at the facilities presented by League Island in regard to the supply of materials used in the building of ships. There you have the Schuylkill region emptying its treasures of iron and coal. You have the Delaware river bringing there the timber and coal of the Lehigh valley; while from the Susquehanna you carry to it the same exhaustless resources of Pennsylvania. By railroad, canal, and river everything required in the building of iron-clad vessels can be brought to the very point where the Secretary of the Navy recommends the establishment of this depot.

To be sure you can have all these materials carried to New London also. You can have them carried there from New York, a distance of at least one hundred and fifty miles. The distance between New York and New London is greater, I believe, than that between Philadelphia and New York by some fifty miles. But will this House go into the business of "carrying coal to New-castle?" Will it vote in favor of putting the country and the Navy Department to an extraordinary expense for transporting hundreds of thousands of tons of coal from its natural bed in the State of Pennsylvania to New London, some three hundred miles away? Will you favor such a proposition? Why, in that one item alone, the expense involved, at the present rate of charges for transportation, would be enormous.

So, Mr. Speaker, in regard to iron; you may take it from any part of Pennsylvania. I speak of Pennsylvania in that respect, being better acquainted with its resources, perhaps, than with those of other States. And you must of necessity carry it either by railroad or canal from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles further in going to New London than in going to League Island; to the latter place you have the two rivers, besides railroads and canals. This is looking at the financial view of the subject.

Now, Pennsylvania does not ask anything of this House; Philadelphia does not ask anything of this House; we do not come here to solicit this as a boon. No member of the delegation will crave this of you—will beg for this thing. It is the location decided upon by the Navy Department; it is the location almost recommended in plain words by those who have been attempting to impress upon you erroneous views of this subject by the naval commission.

And I again ask you to read the documents which have been placed before you for the last two or three years. I think they alone would convince the House that the country needs League Island. Sir, there have been other questions raised by these gentlemen, and I will beg leave to say here that I do not know whether a commission of naval officers is the best means of information in this instance, and from which we can receive the most practical ideas. I will take the testimony of a naval officer as to the propriety of building this or that kind of vessel, of using steam or sails, or of constructing iron or wooden ships; but when it comes to the matter of fact of selecting a site for a building, of testifying whether such or such soil is proper or not proper for laying foundations for buildings, I think the view of practical men, men living on the land, who have passed their lives on it, builders, might perhaps be more qualified to give a clearer judgment than the officer.

Now, in regard to the soil of League Island. I know what it is from having been on that island many times. It is located within the limits of the second congressional district of Pennsylvania. Many of my constituents live upon it, and have farms upon it. It is farming land. There is the soil, where it has been for years, and for a long period of time never has had any of the water of the Schuylkill or of the Delaware flowing upon it. Those who live there know this; and such is the experience of men who, for a lifetime, have farmed it, and gathered yearly crops from it.

And then its distance from the working population is another argument which has been forced upon us. Why, sir, many a man now employed at the navy-yard in Philadelphia walks that distance to his home in other directions. The city is vast in its extent; it covers a vast territory, perhaps a vaster territory than any other city in this country. Men who get their living by labor walk miles to perform it, excepting when they are aided by the street-car system; and if you build this navy-yard at League Island, just as is the case near the present yard, you will soon have the neighborhood built up with cottages such as are built in Philadelphia, in which our working people live and have their homes. It is but two and a half miles from the Baltimore depot. You can walk the distance in an hour, or in less than an hour.

Then, in regard to the objection relating to the health of the people living on that island, and in that vicinity. Why, sir, the health of those people is proverbial. It is not an unhealthy district of Philadelphia. I have never heard of any prevailing sickness in this locality, and I think my colleagues will bear me out in the statement. We do not know how such an idea could have got into the heads of this commission, or the minds of this Naval Committee. The workmen of Philadelphia will find their health at and near League Island, the same as those have found it who have lived in that vicinity heretofore, uniformly good.

And, Mr. Speaker, more than ten thousand skilled workmen live near there; skilled workmen in every respect, especially in all the metals and in wood. They constitute a body of men perhaps as skilled as any body of men in the country, ten thousand of them, equal to the entire population of New London. Oh, yes; the skilled workmen of the country would go to New London! New London is fifty miles further from

New York than Philadelphia is. It is only one hundred and fifty miles removed from the skilled workmen of New York. My friend, and the majority report of this naval commission, say that skilled workmen will go to New London. You will build a large city at New London, in time, no doubt. So you may. It has taken nearly two hundred years to build the city of Philadelphia; two hundred years has its population been increasing, until it now numbers over six hundred thousand souls. I will not attempt to demonstrate how long it will take New London to become a great city, and to contain a population in which will be found ten thousand skilled workmen. It will take you a long while to get up this great city; the present rebellion will be crushed, wars with England and France and the continental Powers will be fought out before New London will grow to the size of a respectable city, or grow to such an extent as to attract workmen from Philadelphia, with the comforts of life which they can obtain there, or even to draw them from New York.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say something as to the alleged difficulty of vessels getting in and out of the Delaware river to and from League Island, should it be selected as the location. Why, sir, you cannot, of course, get large vessels up a long river in an hour or two. You cannot rush to the city of Philadelphia with a fleet in a few hours. But I will tell you what you can do. When you have built iron-clads at Philadelphia, you can get them out; you can get them to their destination; you can save just one hundred and twenty miles of the rough coast of New Jersey, along which you must take them to the southern waters, if they be built at New London; you can save the anxiety of the families of officers and men in monitors and iron-clads, who in times past have in some instances looked in vain for the arrival of those ships at their destined ports. You can take them down this quiet, placid river, and take them out of it through twenty-three feet of water, over bars which, as the gentleman says, we have in that river. You have never failed to do it. My word for it, you have never failed to bring to the city of Philadelphia any vessel which, for purposes of commerce or trade, or for national purposes, it was desirable to bring there.

It is true, of course, that a few inches of water may make a difference. If the bed of the river is of rock it would make a material difference. But, sir, here is the bed of this Delaware river of soft mud or clay that will yield five or six or seven inches. If you have a vessel drawing twenty-three feet of water, or even more, you can bring it safely to the Philadelphia navy-yard, and somewhat easier to League Island. The naval commission, whose majority report seems to have been the basis of the action of the majority of the Naval Committee, does not deny this.

Mr. Speaker, I cheerfully take anything into consideration which has been said by the older officers of the Navy. I will not cease to admire those men; I will not cease to think that they are among the heroes of this country. I will not forget the services of Rear Admiral Smith, of Rear Admiral Paulding, of Rear Admiral Gregory, of Rear Admiral Stringham. But the experience of those men in their active lives was with wooden vessels with sails, of which our Navy a few years ago consisted, as did all the navies of the world. They perhaps might not have liked to come up the Delaware river with a sailing ship, for in doing so they may have been delayed.

The river is long and winding. I do not wonder that these officers may have a prejudice in their minds against the Delaware river, and that therefore they may have been disposed to throw their influence against League Island as a location for a navy-yard. Sir, those are men whose experience has not been with vessels constructed largely of steel and iron. The views of those gentlemen are views adopted forty or fifty years ago. They are gallant men all of them. I hope they may continue to live to adorn the Navy, and that they may have the opportunity of rendering service at our various naval stations, and in other positions of responsibility. I honor those men; but, sir, I cannot, at this day, in view of the modern improvements in naval architecture, deem it an important question whether their opinions are favorable or unfavorable to the location of the proposed navy-yard at League Island.

Mr. Speaker, there is one other point to which I wish to refer—that with regard to the building of docks and wharves. Sir, you cannot have a navy-yard upon the shore line of a river. If you select New London, you will not bring your vessels to the rough shore line. You must have docks and wharves for their reception. Wherever navy-yards have been established, either at Philadelphia, Brooklyn, or Charlestown, all have docks, wharves, and other artificial facilities. There must be means of protection for vessels building or repairing, conveniences for getting to and from them—all kinds of facilities must be placed there by artificial means. What, then, when you come to dig fifty and sixty feet into hard rock, will be the result? When you begin to excavate the solid rock at New London for wharves and docks, how enormous will be the expense in comparison with the expense of filling up two or three feet upon the soil of League Island, should that be necessary! Is not the statement of the facts an unanswerable argument?

Compare, sir, the cutting down of solid rock fifty and sixty feet, with the expense of filling up a few feet! Men who have been interested in railroads will tell you that rock excavation is costly to a great degree. The cost of filling up these two or three feet on League Island would be merely nominal in comparison, and no one will deny that at New London there will have to be excavation of rock for docks and wharves and other necessary works for a navy-yard.

Mr. Speaker, I do not and I have not looked upon this proposition from a mere local point of view. I have not been elected, or re-elected, to Congress, nor have my colleagues, on any issue connected with the establishment of a navy-yard at League Island. There is, and has been, no local issue on the subject. We and the citizens of Philadelphia are only interested in its establishment there because we are well satisfied that it is the very best place. I do not think we can do better than accept the reports of the Secretary of the Navy as to the desirability of League Island for a naval station. He has insisted upon it again and again, and if we adopt his views I think we will satisfy the whole country.

I believe, sir, every private ship-yard in the land has been building iron-clad vessels for our Navy. Some which have been ordered by the Government are yet unfinished. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] asks, why was not this naval depot built years ago? Why was it not done within the last two years? Why have we not had a navy-yard for iron-clads before? Because, sir, of such arguments as have been used in the majority report of the naval commission and the report of the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was because of an effort to persuade members of Congress that we have no place for a naval station except New London. If Congress two years ago had passed an act authorizing the construction of a navy-yard for iron-clads at the point indicated by the Secretary of the Navy nearly all of these unfinished vessels would have been completed or near completion, and we would be able to bring this war sooner to a termination. But this has not been done, no navy-yard has been built, and Congress is responsible, and not the Navy Department, for the neglect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am merely going to repeat a few of the arguments I have advanced. My intention has been to present the matter in a practical point of view. There has been before the House a great deal of scientific discussion. I do not propose to enter into it. I propose to leave that out entirely. I need not inform the members of the House of the necessity that iron ships should be built for the Navy. I do not think any one controverts that fact. Now we can have such a navy-yard only in fresh water, in deep water, and for economy, near the materials used in the construction of the proposed vessels. We must have that navy-yard for iron-clads near a population which can rapidly furnish the requisite mechanical skill. We must look to all of these means, and, so far as I have seen and been able to examine, we can secure them better at League Island than at any other point named. There, within the city of Philadelphia, you have nearly six hundred acres of land, nearly every acre of which is suitable for being built upon. It may be necessary to drive piles, but it is better to drive piles in a yielding soil for the purposes of machinery than to excavate solid foundations into the hard rock. That is the evidence of all men who are skilled in these things. There can be no doubt about that. Besides, you have given to you two miles of water front upon two broad rivers, the Delaware upon one side, and the Schuylkill on the other. League Island seems, indeed, to be a place marked out by nature for this navy-yard. I will now bring my remarks to a close, as other gentlemen may desire to address the House on this question. I think there is a general disposition to have a yard for iron-clads. We of Philadelphia want it established at the best place, which, according to the Secretary of the Navy, and others, is League Island. As I have said before, we ask for nothing as a mere local favor. We desire that the country should have its "navy-yard for iron vessels and machinery" located for the advantage of the Navy; and we have seen no arguments presented why this House should hesitate to decide for this most eligible and convenient locality.

Mr. BROOMALL. I offer the following amendment to the substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the President be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint a commission of seven scientific and practical men, three of whom shall be officers of the Navy not below the rank of captain, who shall select a site for a navy-yard and naval station for iron-clad vessels, having regard to advantage of location as well as economy of construction, and make report to the President for his confirmation.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if said report shall be confirmed by the President, the Secretary of the Navy shall forthwith procure the title of such site to be properly vested in the United States, and adopt measures for the immediate commencement of the work.

No member of this body can have read the repeated recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy and the reports from the Naval Committee, and listened to the arguments on the question, without seeing the necessity for such a work as is contemplated by this bill. The only question, it seems to me, for us to decide is the best mode of fixing upon the proper site for the construction of such a navy-yard, and it is with a view of hitting upon what I conceive to be the best means that I have offered this amendment to the substitute of my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

No member of this body can have read the majority and minority reports of this committee, and heard the able arguments upon this subject, without feeling that there are serious and perhaps insurmountable objections to both the sites named, the city of New London and League Island. I will proceed to consider shortly some of the objections which have been urged against each; and first upon the question of salt water. It has seemed to me, from the Secretary's recommendation, and from the arguments made here upon both sides, that fresh water is at least best adapted to the business of iron ship-building. I find in the report of the majority of the committee—and I believe the statement made by that majority to be correct upon that subject—that the corrosion of iron from the action of salt water is, as they say, one half inch upon the surface in every ninety-one years.

I find, also, that the influence of the sea water upon such surfaces, where the surfaces are sometimes wet and sometimes dry, is one half more than the influence of clear salt water; which would make the amount of corrosion three fourths of an inch in ninety-one years upon surfaces so exposed.

I find, also, from the same report—and I believe it, by other authorities I have read, to be correct in this particular—that foul sea water, such as is found in the holds of vessels, and which attacks the iron upon the inside, corrodes the iron at the rate of one inch in ninety-one years.

Now, when we consider that the inside of a vessel comes constantly in contact with foul weather, and foul sea water, and that the outer armored portion comes in contact almost exclusively with the sea weather outside, that is with water and air alternating, we will find by a simple calculation that the iron upon the inside and outside together, affected upon the outside by the clear sea water, and upon the inside by foul water, and in each instance by the air, will corrode at the rate of one and three quarters of an inch in ninety-one years, two inches in one hundred and four years, or one quarter of an inch in thirteen years, which is a small portion of the life of a sea-going vessel.

I find again that the action of sea weather and sea water upon the surface of iron is not regular; that in some places the corrosion will scarcely be seen, while in other places it will be very material; that in some instances the iron upon the same plate will corrode away three times as fast as the average, and in other instances scarcely be corroded at all. The calculations and statements of the committee are based upon the average. We have to take into account the maximum of corrosion, because we must guard all points of the iron against attack. The maximum will then be three quarters of an inch in thirteen years. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] speaks of the effect of sea water upon iron as not a material matter. He treats it as of little consequence, and thinks it has been greatly exaggerated by the advocates of a fresh-water site. I think if he will turn to his own statement and make the calculation that I have made of the time in which the effect of sea water upon the armor of an ironed vessel will almost absolutely destroy it, he will see that it will be done in the course of thirteen years.

It is said, however, by the gentleman from Connecticut, as an argument against the corrosion of iron by sea water, and as an argument in favor of the existence of fresh water at New London, that a certain chain, belonging to a marine railway, after being in the water for twelve years, was taken up and found to be scarcely corroded. The answer to that is that this particular iron may have been of a kind not likely to be corroded by salt water; because some iron is scarcely perceptibly affected by the sea; some portions even of the same plate are scarcely perceptibly affected, while others are absolutely destroyed. It is to be borne in mind, moreover, that this chain was a chain belonging to a marine railway, upon the shore of a river, where, if anywhere, the fresh water of the river above would float upon the surface of the salt water. Everybody knows the difficulty with which different waters mingle with one another. Everybody who has seen the waters of the Missouri and Mississippi passing down the river after the junction of the two, side by side for miles, with a distinct line of demarcation between them, will admit with me that waters do not readily mix; and where two waters are of different specific gravity, as in the case of fresh and salt water, the difficulty of mixing is even still greater, and a considerable length of time will elapse, and a considerable commotion of the waters must be had, before the salt and the fresh water will mingle. Now, the fresh water of the river Thames, flowing down into the sound below, naturally overflows the salt, at the shore and in the middle of the channel. Now, the returning tide, as every one familiar with the action of tides well knows, floats everything lighter than the sea water itself to the shore, so that the shore would have the fresh water from above while the tide is running down, and it would have the fresh water turned from the middle of the channel while the tide is running up. We may therefore set it down as fact, that if there is any fresh water in that harbor at all, it is upon the surface of the water, and at the shore. The argument drawn from that chain at the shore, therefore, falls to the ground.

But the gentleman from Connecticut denies that the waters are salt at New London. He cites, and cites as powerful authority upon all other subjects, the commission which examined New London, as well as the waters of the Delaware river, and that commission expressly say that the waters at New London are salt. I do not know what better means of information the gentleman from Connecticut has than the commission. I do know that both the gentleman from Connecticut and the commission have better means of information than I have, and I am not going to vote upon questions involving these disputed facts in favor of or against New London or League Island without further inquiry. The gentleman visited New London with the Committee on Naval Affairs. I had not the good fortune to be with them upon that occasion. I requested the gentleman, if my recollection serves me, to bring me a bottle of the water, in order that I might test it, and see whether it was salt or not. Whether the gentleman found all the bottles at New London filled with other fluids, so that there was no room for salt water, I know not; but certain it is that the bottle did not come, and therefore we are left in the dark on that question.

But the gentleman from Connecticut, and those who argue on his side of this question, and the commission also, I believe, propose various means of avoiding this difficulty of salt water at New London. They propose, in the first place, that vessels when not in use shall be raised out of the water. I suppose the idea is to elevate them some fifty or sixty feet above the water on Long Island sound and let them stand there on stilts. Another proposition from the same source is this. Somewhere near this proposed site at New London there is a basin of fresh water elevated at some one hundred feet above the level of the tide. The gentleman proposes to use that as a means of obviating this difficulty of the salt water. He does not tell us exactly how it is to be contrived, but I suppose the only way would be to put the vessels in the basin at the elevation of a hundred feet above the tide. Well, I rather incline to think that that would avoid the difficulty to a very considerable extent, but I would like to know in what state of readiness the gentleman would be with his armored fleet in the harbor of New London, one half perched upon stilts a hundred or a hundred and fifty feet high, and the other half in the basin, if the harbor should be suddenly attacked.

These contrivances for obviating the effect of salt water upon armored vessels show that the gentlemen themselves hardly believe what they say when they say that salt water is not injurious, and also, that the river water at New London is not salt.

Again, some argument has been used by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] against the peculiar topography of League Island. Some argument, equally strong, has been used by my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] against the topography of the site proposed at New London. Let us look at them a moment. It is said, and I will not dispute that here, because it is not necessary to do so for the purpose of my amendment, that League Island will require to be raised some nine feet by filling before it can be adapted to the purpose of a navy-yard. Grant that; and grant, too, that the calculation made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is correct—that the raising two hundred acres to the height of nine feet, at the cost of one dollar per cubic foot, will require an outlay of $3,120,000. We have that as an argument against the adoption of League Island. But, on the other hand, it is alleged by my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] that New London is between twenty and one hundred and twenty feet above high tide. Every one knows that the site for a navy-yard should not be more than six or seven feet above high tide, at the most. The lower the better, so as not to be liable to overflow. Now, to cut down this average of sixty feet to the proper level, at the same rate of cost, would require an outlay of $20,800,000. I do not see, therefore, that, in this respect, the argument is in favor of New London. It should rather lead us to look for some site where such enormous outlay would not be necessary.

But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] denies the height of the site of New London, as alleged by my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] So, also, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] deny the depth assigned to League Island; and I, for one, for the purpose of my argument, am perfectly willing to set off these disadvantages against one another. I suppose that if New London could exchange a part of its height for the lowness of League Island, if the earth and rock of New London could be transported to League Island, we might, in the course of a century or so, have very good sites for navy-yards, as far as that point is concerned, at both of these places.

In favor of the alleged height of New London, I will remark that the gentleman from Connecticut speaks of a basin a hundred feet in height, covering a hundred acres of ground, supplied by a river which enters just above and contiguous to the proposed site. The height of that position would argue, at least, that the assertions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] are not so wide of the mark, when he says, in effect, that the excavation at New London will be, at least, an average of sixty feet.

Something, too, has been said about the defensibility of these points. It is said, on the one hand, that New London is not easily defensible, while, on the other hand, it is said that League Island is not easily defensible. I am willing to set off these assertions against one another, and to find a place which is easily defensible for this navy-yard. Both sites, for aught I care, may be considered to be wanting in that particular. But there is this to be borne in mind as a difference between them, that if the harbor of New London should be blockaded at tide-water, there would be no way for vessels in the harbor to escape. They would either have to run the blockading squadron or remain in the harbor; whereas vessels at Philadelphia, or anywhere in the Delaware river, have either of two alternatives to get to sea. The Delaware and Raritan canal could be enlarged and made a ship canal of, so that vessels could get to New York in that way, or a ship canal could be cut between the Delaware and Chesapeake bays, and vessels could escape by that way, so that an enemy would have to blockade the Delaware, the Chesapeake, and the harbor of New York to prevent the escape of vessels from the vicinity of Philadelphia, whereas the blockading of the harbor of New London would effectually prevent vessels escaping from that harbor. So much upon that question.

Again, it is urged, and with a good deal of propriety and force, on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] who has just addressed the House so ably, that the materials for building these ships are furnished largely by the State of Pennsylvania, and he asks, with a good deal of force, why this business should be taken so far away from the materials. Let me look for a moment at the figures in the report. I find by that that Pennsylvania furnishes sixty-three per cent. of all the iron furnished by the entire United States. I find also that it furnishes seventy-three per cent. of all the coal furnished by the United States. It is also a truth that the Delaware river furnishes greater facilities for obtaining timber for the building of ships than probably any other river emptying into the Atlantic. The ship-building timber from the State of Delaware, and the State of Maryland, is brought without any transshipment by railroad to any site upon the Delaware river, because the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore railroad touches the Delaware almost the entire way from Philadelphia to Wilmington.

Why, I ask again, should this business be taken directly away from the material to a place where the material will have to be transferred at a very considerable expense, the extent of which I will not now take time to consider? Why should it be taken to a place where, it seems to me, there are no advantages at all commensurate with the expense of such transfer?

Again, it is admitted by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that the town of New London contains but about ten thousand population. He admits that that population affords a very insufficient supply of workmen for the business contemplated here. But he says that workmen can be brought from the city of New York, a point which is nearer by fifty miles to any proposed site on the Delaware river than is New London. I do not know whether the gentleman contemplates the workmen living in New York, and visiting their homes every night and returning every morning to their work. Probably he does not. It would be about as feasible as his project of a navy upon stilts.

Now, in regard to the facility of obtaining workmen, any point upon the Delaware river presents advantages which can hardly be found anywhere else, which no point upon this continent that I know of presents; and Philadelphia, which embraces League Island, is within half an hour's ride by railroad, at an expense of only eight cents per man, of any site upon the Delaware river which has been presented. Why then take the workmen and the material from the place where they now are and remove them to a site which, to say the least of it, does not show advantages commensurate with the expense?

But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] complains of the tortuous character of the channel in the Delaware river. Why, sir, that very tortuous channel is one of the means of the defense of the sites on the river. The Government of the United States can have a knowledge of that channel that no one outside of this country can obtain. The city of Philadelphia can furnish pilots to take vessels where they can pass without difficulty, while the attacking force, ignorant of the channel, would probably be wholly wrecked in trying to avoid the crooks and turns in it. The gentleman from Connecticut also points out that there are certain shoals in the river Delaware below Philadelphia which are objectionable. Those, too, give an advantage in the way of defense. They increase the defensibility of a navy-yard on the Delaware river, provided only that those shoals are not such as to prevent the passage of vessels of the requisite size.

Now, by looking at the reports, and at the coast survey, you will find that the channel of the river Delaware is eighteen and a half feet deep at low tide, and twenty-five feet at high tide, and that these points occupy a very small portion, indeed, of the channel between the mouth of the Delaware and the city of Philadelphia. It is not necessary that a vessel passing out of the river should choose extreme low tide. A vessel drawing twenty feet of water can readily enough pass out over these few shoals, which are well known to the Government. All they have to do is to avoid extreme low tide and take advantage of high tide.

If you will turn to the report you will find enumerated there the harbors of the United States, and that not more than five or six of them will admit the entrance of vessels of more than twenty feet draught of water. The harbor of Charleston has only eleven feet depth of water at low tide; that of Savannah but eleven feet—I mean at the entrance of the harbor; Mobile has twelve feet; Galveston twelve feet; the Mississippi river thirteen feet; Portland sixteen feet; Boston eighteen feet; Salem nineteen feet; and then come about as many harbors which will admit the passage of vessels of more than twenty feet draught of water.

Now, we must adapt our vessels to the purpose for which they are intended, and with this considerable list of harbors which have only a small depth of water, it is the duty of the Government to adapt vessels to this small draught of water. It is not intended by the United States to build vessels for the purpose of having armies transported across the ocean and invading foreign waters. The object of our iron-clads is to defend our own country and its harbors, and a considerable portion of their effectiveness in this respect will consist in their being of sufficiently light draught of water to enable them to enter the most of the harbors.

I therefore throw aside the argument that the Delaware river is too shallow, that shallowness being an advantage upon the score of defensibility, and no disadvantage when we consider that our vessels must be adapted to the harbors that they are destined to defend.

But the gentleman from Connecticut complains that the ice of the Delaware river affords obstructions to the passage of vessels and renders the site ineligible upon that account. Why, sir, I do not know what the gentleman means by going further north to avoid ice. I have always been under the impression that the way to avoid ice was to get nearer the equator. I have yet to learn that, in fresh water, at the latitude of New London, there ought to be less ice than in the Delaware river, at the latitude of Philadelphia. But probably the explanation of the matter may be found in the fact that the water of New London is too salt to freeze. If so, I answer it is too salt to build iron-clad vessels in. But the ice upon the Delaware river is no formidable obstruction. The ice upon that river is rarely found fast at the town of Chester; it is never found fast below it. I remember, during the course of my life, but two instances in which the Delaware was frozen over as far down as the town of Chester. Those instances were in 1856 and 1857, two very cold winters in succession, during both of which, if I remember aright, the ice was so thick in the Susquehanna, at the crossing of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore railroad, that the track was actually laid upon the ice, and the locomotive and cars were for a considerable time taken across in that way. Only on those occasions, within my recollection, has the Delaware river been frozen over as far down as the town of Chester. It is usually kept open all the way to Philadelphia during all seasons of all years. I remember only those instances in which it has not been. Those instances may probably operate to the disadvantage of a site nearer to Philadelphia than the town of Chester, but they cannot operate to the disadvantage of any site that may be chosen below it.

But the gentleman from Connecticut lays great stress upon the report of this commission that was appointed to visit these sites and choose between them. A commission appointed by a resolution of this House visited New London and League Island, and, after extended examination and discussion, found considerable disadvantages in each place, but preferred New London, not so much because it was the best, as because it was the least bad of the two. If the gentleman will turn now to the resolution by which that commission was appointed he will find that it differed widely from what I propose now. He will find that its jurisdiction, if I may so term it, was limited to the two sites—League Island, upon the Delaware river, and New London, with power to look at Narragansett bay. Such was the duty of the commission. They had no power to select the best site in the United States as I propose that this commission shall have. They had only the power to choose between those two; and after enumerating and admitting the manifold disadvantages of both they chose New London as the least bad.

Again, the gentleman argues something upon the services of the Naval Committee who visited both these sites, and preferred New London as the least bad. I do not know what peculiar facilities the Naval Committee may have for judging of sites for iron-clad navy-yards. My experience in reference to traveling committees of this House and of other bodies would lead me to suppose that the chief business of such a committee is of an entirely different character from that of looking at sites for navy-yards; and I will do justice to this committee by saying that, so far as I saw their operations, they performed the duty, which I believe is the general duty of such committees, most admirably. They did eat and drink in a manner that would do credit to any committee of this House. I do not attach any great weight to the opinion of the Naval Committee, any more than to the opinion of a like number of gentlemen selected anywhere in this House. Not a man of them, so far as I know, is either a scientific or a practical man in reference to this question. The members of that committee could have very little means of information that this House itself cannot have; and I am sure I do them entire justice when I say that I admit their claims to statesmanship, but I do not believe that they know how to drive a bolt in a vessel.

Now, it would appear to me almost impossible that, throughout the entire territory of the United States there should not be places that would avoid the difficulties of both these sites. Are there not points that are not at least four, six, or eight feet below the level of the tide, and, as they say, marshy at that? Are there not points that are not liable to the objections alleged on account of ice? Are there not points better in all requisite particulars than either of the places alluded to? Are there not places that will not require cutting down from twenty to one hundred and twenty feet to make them eligible at all? Is there not some eligible point within the limits of fresh water? I cannot believe there is not. But if a commission such as I contemplate in my proposition should fix upon New London, I, for one, would be satisfied. If, on the other hand, it should fix upon League Island, I shall also be satisfied. I shall then believe that these places, while they are bad, are still the best within the reach of the Government of the United States, and on that ground only will I consent to such a selection.

Now, there are two or three sites on the Delaware river, a considerable distance below the city of Philadelphia, which are not liable to some of the objections that operate against League Island. One of them is Chester; another, Marcus Hook; another, New Castle. This traveling committee looked at one of these sites and then condemned them all. They do not say upon what ground they condemned them. They do not say that these sites are open to most of the objections alleged against League Island. They do not pretend to say that any of these sites require filling. They do not pretend to say that either of them can be charged with lacking proper foundation. Yet these things are assumed by a general sweeping condemnation. They will admit, too, these sites are nearer the ocean than League Island, and therefore less objectionable, according to their argument, on that account.

Why these gentlemen did not visit all of these sites it is difficult for me to say. The Naval Committee was not limited, as the commission was, and might and ought to have visited all of these sites. What I complain of, then, is that they did not, but condemned them without examination.

Let me say to this House that Chester or Marcus Hook furnishes all of the advantages which I know of for an iron-clad navy-yard. The population of that vicinity is about equal to that of New London, somewhere between eight and ten thousand. They are upon the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore railroad. Workmen can come from Philadelphia or Wilmington in half an hour, at an expense of only eight cents by buying a season ticket.

I wish to add that at the point of Chester, of which I speak, the building of iron-clads has been going on since the commencement of this war, and from eight hundred to a thousand men have been so employed. Why, sir, more iron-clads have been turned out from the town of Chester than perhaps the gentleman from Connecticut has ever seen. Materials, too, can be brought from the very mines and furnaces, and landed upon the very spot where they are to be used, at either of these sites, or at the town of New Castle below, without the cost of a single transshipment.

So, then, these towns are within the vicinity of workmen. They are within the vicinity of materials. They are in fresh water. They are free from the danger of ice. They are better defensible than New London. They present advantages which it is worth while for a commission to look at. All I ask is that all places be examined, and that selected which is best adapted to the purpose. It is with that view I offer the amendment, and I sincerely trust the House will adopt it.

Mr. PIKE. Whoever reads the lucid and very able report of the Secretary of the Navy must be gratified, if not surprised, at the rapid and enormous increase of the Navy since the commencement of this rebellion. It now consists of over five hundred thousand tons of shipping—a very considerable fraction of the whole tonnage of the country. All sizes of vessels are embraced, from the tug of one hundred tons up to the Dunderberg of Mr. Webb, of more than seven thousand tons burden. Almost all of the kinds of ships known to naval architecture can be found in our Navy—all the practicable shapes and models, if not some which are entirely impracticable. Machinery of all the approved patterns has been introduced to propel these ships. The Navy Department has called upon the whole mechanical genius of the country for the construction of these admirable engines of war. It has gone into the widest variety of experiment in order to bring about the completest vessels which can be obtained. Any one disposed to criticise its action would say that it has been too experimental. I know that this is not the general opinion, but those who have watched the detailed action of the Department must come to the conclusion that if it has erred at all—and I do not say that it has—it has been in being too experimental, in trying too many new devices rather than in adhering to the old models.

In accomplishing this purpose, Mr. Speaker, there will have been expended during this Administration $230,000,000, a very generous sum, and one which would startle us were it not that we have become accustomed to the bewildering figures of the War Department. This large sum, on the whole, has been wisely and prudently expended. The most rigorous examination has been made by committees of both branches of Congress, some of them constituted strongly adverse to the present officers in charge of the Department, and nothing of misconduct worthy of the attention of Congress has been found. Frauds, of course, there have been, but they have been ferreted out in the Department itself, and the guilty punished; and, Mr. Speaker, in reviewing the action of the Navy since hostilities broke out, it is only bare justice to say that it has accomplished all that could have been expected of it. It had to do the dull, tedious labor of the blockade, according to the strictest of the latest decisions on that vexed subject—a blockade of a coast over thirty-five hundred miles in extent, and which was pronounced impossible by the European diplomats.

You will recollect the surprise of Lord Lyons, when he asked whether this Government really intended to blockade the whole southern coast. It had in addition to that to hunt the piratical cruisers of the first naval Power into their various hiding-places, all over the world of waters; and when it came to warfare, it was the most difficult kind of naval warfare, that of attacking land batteries; and who will say that in all of these particulars the Navy has not accomplished its purpose?

The enormous price in the confederacy of articles which have to run the blockade, and the nineteen hundred and seventy-nine prizes taken by our vessels, tell with a certainty that the blockade has been most perfect. And we have seen, in following the history of the war, that in its various attacks upon land batteries the Navy has been equally successful. The genius of Du Pont devised a new mode, and a most successful one, at Port Royal, of attacking land forces, and this added greatly both to his own fame and that of our Navy; while the gallantry and intrepidity of Farragut at New Orleans and Mobile placed our Navy foremost in the annals of marine warfare. And we all but lately felt that the gleams of victory streaming across the Atlantic from the guns of the Kearsarge off Cherbourg strengthened the loyal heart of the country at a time when it was greatly given to despondency.

The blockade has been rigorously enforced, the warfare against land forces has been successfully conducted, and the British pirates sunk and driven into confederate ports, as the ocean with its myriad hiding-places was no longer safe for them. A brilliant record for our gallant Navy.

And the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, at which I arrive from the brief survey of the increase, the present condition, and the action of the Navy for the last four years, is that we have vessels enough for the present. We can afford fifty steamers lying off and on to blockade the port of Wilmington. We fill the harbors of Charleston and of Savannah, and the bay of Mobile, with our armed ships, and still have enough to protect northern ports against the possibility of attack.

It is apparently idle to talk about taking any of the principal southern ports without the assistance of the Army, but when Lieutenant General Grant is ready to detail a sufficient force for the purpose, the Navy will be, as it always has been, ready to furnish vessels of the fittest class for coöperation in the work of the capture of Wilmington, Charleston, or Mobile.

And now, having accomplished thus much, I insist that for the purposes of this rebellion we need not stretch another keel, at any rate not for any vessel of considerable size. All we have to do now with our Navy is to keep the present force in repair. With six hundred and seventy-one vessels now in the service, the larger portion built since 1860, and with an ordnance production during the last year of more than fifteen hundred guns, I say our private and public ship-yards are abundantly sufficient for present purposes. We need no other facilities for the production of still more vessels. Let us finish those we have on the stocks, and then keep the whole in fighting trim, and we shall not lack in this branch of our great war.

Why then, I ask this House, should we enter upon this enlarged expenditure for the purpose of creating additional monsters of the sea, for fear of some possible future foreign war? Is it wise? Have we not enough to do now to furnish means to carry on this war? It is with the greatest reluctance that we now tax our constituents enough to pay one third the current expenditures of the Government. Shall we rush into the unknown sea of new expenditures, which can be demonstrated to be wholly unnecessary, in order to compass the present great purpose of the country? I hope not.

The surest guarantee against future war is to succeed in this. The suppression of the rebellion is worth more to us, both for defense and offense, than a thousand ships. When that is done no nation will care to attack us, and we need not fear the combined attack of all Europe.

With all due deference to the superior wisdom of the gentleman in charge of the Navy Department, I do not hesitate to express the opinion that our expenditures in that branch of our war—so necessary and so well made—have reached their highest point, and should, hereafter, be retrenched. It will be a glorious day for the country when the same thing can, with truth, be said of the War Department.

For the purpose, then, of adjourning this subject until some time in the future, a time of which I cannot but be hopeful, when the national obligations may run up to at least fifty per cent. of their face in the most favorable markets, I shall move to lay the subject on the table. In the mean time the investigation can go on, and we can ascertain in the large and broad expanse of this country where is the best site where in some future time we will establish a grand navy-yard where we can produce those perfect maritime creations which, at the same time that they are invulnerable at sea, shall possess that admirable power of propulsion which will make them the most rapid of vessels, and the most destructive to the enemies of our country.

I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. THAYER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Having been summarily cut off from the remarks I intended to make upon this subject, I ask leave to print them.

No objection was made.

[The remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

The question was taken on Mr. PIKE's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 53, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Benham, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose V. Clark, Cobb, Colc, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Elliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Boyd, Branderage, Broomall, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Edgerton, English, Frank, Hooper, John H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Thayer, Unson, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Windom, and Yeaman—53.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Anderson, Bliss, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Cresswell, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Fenton, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jencks, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, King, Lazear, McKinney, Middleton, Nelson, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Strouse, Thomas, Voorhees, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—49.

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was adopted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 464)* for the relief of Deborah Jones; when the Speaker signed the same.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The SPEAKER stated that the business next in order was the consideration of joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating the treaty made by Great Britain on behalf of the British provinces in North America, and to appoint commissioners to negotiate a new treaty with the British Government based upon the true principles of reciprocity, said resolution having been postponed on the 1st of April last until this day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the precise position of the joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall it pass? Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORRILL. Is it not in order for the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD,] who has charge of the joint resolution, to allow me to offer as a substitute the joint resolution for unconditional notice?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, shall be reconsidered by general consent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is if the gentleman voted for the third reading.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think I did, and I make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WARD. The preamble was adopted, and before the previous question was moved on the passage of the joint resolution the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved to postpone it. The question now is on its passage, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the previous question for a moment. I merely want to make an explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The previous question can be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question would not cut off the privileged motion to reconsider the third reading, although the second of the previous question would.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the House is now prepared to adopt the resolution for notice pure and simple. It came within a vote or two of it last session, and from what has transpired since, I think we must all agree that the notice ought to be given. I hope, therefore, that the House will allow me to offer that proposition again.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to having that proposition again submitted. It was voted down at the last session of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. By a very close vote.

Mr. WARD. I shall therefore object to it. I propose to have a direct vote upon this joint resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What would be the condition of the bill in case the previous question be not seconded?

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution would be open to discussion and amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] whether he will agree to allow a motion to strike out of the joint resolution all after and including the word "unless," so as to make it simply direct notice to be given of the termination of the treaty. I will be then willing to vote for the proposition. The idea of authorizing a commission is against the genius of all our legislation. Such a matter is solely within the province of the Government.

Mr. WARD. I insist upon the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I will withdraw it for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Journal clerk that the yeas and nays were not taken on ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time. The yeas and nays were taken on the amendments. Any gentleman, therefore, can move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following as a substitute for the joint resolution, and I move the previous question on the whole subject.

Mr. WARD. Is not that substitute the same as was voted down at the last session?

The SPEAKER. There is an important change from the one voted down at last session.

Mr. WARD. Is it a different proposition?

The SPEAKER. It is a different proposition.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas by the reciprocity treaty, concluded the 5th day of June, and ratified on the 9th day of September, A. D. 1854, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, for the period of ten years from the date at which it should come into operation; and further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties should give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties, according to the provisions of article fifth of said treaty, being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of said term of ten years, or at any time afterwards, and thereby annul and abrogate said treaty; and whereas it has become desirable to terminate said treaty in the manner therein provided for, as its terms no longer appear reciprocally beneficial or satisfactory: With a view, therefore, that steps be taken for the termination of the said treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, in the mode prescribed in its fifth article, at the earliest practicable period therein provided for, and that the attention of the Governments of both countries may be directed to the adoption of all proper measures for an amicable adjustment of any matters of difference or dispute which may remain or arise in consequence of the termination of said treaty,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to give to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland the notice required by the fifth article of the said reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, for the termination of the same.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Vermont will explain the difference between his substitute and the proposition voted down at last session. I cannot perceive the difference.

The SPEAKER. The difference is that the words "at his discretion" are struck out, and the words "and requested" inserted; also that the words "Government of Great Britain" are changed into the words "Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Mr. WARD. There is another point of order. The preamble has been already adopted, and there has been no motion to reconsider it.

The SPEAKER. The whole joint resolution is thrown open by the reconsideration of the vote ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on agreeing to Mr. MORRILL's substitute.

The question was then taken upon the substitute offered by Mr. MORRILL to the original resolution; and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the preamble was adopted.

Mr. WARD. I submit that it is not proper, after this lapse of time, to move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is well taken. After one day the motion to reconsider cannot be submitted except on Monday on a motion to suspend the rules. No objection having been made to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, the Chair considered the motion to reconsider as having been entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the substitute of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and also moved to lay that motion on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope this joint resolution will not be sent to the Senate until we can have an opportunity to move a reconsideration of the preamble on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. As the majority of the House evidently seems desirous to get at this resolution in some shape, the Chair will suggest that a motion to recommit is in order after the third reading has been ordered.

Mr. WARD. I will then move to recommit this joint resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend that motion by substituting the Committee of Ways and Means for the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WARD. Would it be in order at this time to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. WARD. I then move that the whole subject be laid on the table, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 84, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Frank, Grider, Harrington, Herriek, Knapp, Law, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Scott, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Eckley, English, Farnsworth, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, High, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, and Wilson—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Anderson, Blair, Bliss, William G. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Griswold, Deering, Driggs, Dumont, Elliot, Fenton, Garfield, Creswell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, Jencks, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, King, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, McBride, Middleton, Nelson, Perry, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Strouse, Voorhees, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—53.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the previous question upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WARD. I made a motion to recommit to the Committee on Commerce. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] moved to amend by referring the subject to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw any motion or suggestion of that kind which I made. I prefer to have it passed now.

The demand for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. WARD to recommit to the Committee on Commerce, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time, and being taken it was agreed to.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Upon this question Mr. MORRILL called for the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I understand we are now to take a vote simply upon the resolution, and not upon the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The preamble was read the third time on the 1st of April last. A motion to reconsider the preamble was made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] raised the point of order that the motion to reconsider could not be entertained at this time, which point the Chair sustained. The question is now upon the passage of the joint resolution and the preamble together, upon which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] demands the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of this joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 57, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, English, Farnsworth, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, High, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Yeaman—85.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 3.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Arnold, James S. Brown, Chandler, Cobb, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Harding, Harrington, Harlick, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Anderson, Blair, Bliss, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Graves, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Dumont, Fenton, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, King, LeBlond, Longyear, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, Nelson, Perry, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Rogers, Strouse, Voorhees, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—40.

So the preamble and joint resolution were passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the title so as to read as follows:

A joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the treaty of reciprocity of the 5th day of June, A. D. 1854.

The motion was agreed to.

MAJOR N. S. BRINTON.

By unanimous consent, the House took from the Speaker's table and proceeded to consider a joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) reported from the Committee on Military Affairs for the relief of Major N. S. Brinton.

Mr. GARFIELD. As a bill has already been passed for the relief of Major Brinton, I move to lay this joint resolution on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PRINTING TREASURY REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK reported back from the Committee on Printing the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That fifteen hundred copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents, and one hundred and fifty copies of the estimates of appropriation, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the remonstrance, referred some days ago to the Committee of Elections, against the claim of certain gentlemen to represent the State of Louisiana, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the House (at twenty minutes after three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 14, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. W. H. CHANNING, D. D., Chaplain to the House of Representatives.

Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY, of Delaware, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NESMITH presented a memorial of the Legislature of Oregon in favor of the location of a national foundry, arsenal, and manufactory of arms at the falls of the Willamette, near Oregon City, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of medical storekeepers praying to be allowed the pay and emoluments of surgeons in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 83) to encourage enlistments and promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution relative to the pardon indorsed by the President of the United States on the petition of Lucien Anderson and others in behalf of William Yocum, now confined in the penitentiary at Albany, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of the members of the grand and petit juries in attendance at the circuit and district courts of the United States in the district of Michigan praying for an increase of their compensation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of members of the bar of the District of Columbia praying that the supreme court of the District be authorized to appoint a stenographic reporter, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

THANKS TO CAPTAIN WINSLOW.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 5th instant, recommending the passage of a vote of thanks to Captain John A. Winslow, of the United States Navy, to report a joint resolution to that effect. The facts in regard to this matter are known to all the members of the Senate, and I presume that I shall be only carrying out the views of this body in asking that the resolution may now be considered.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution (S. No. 83) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in the conflict with the piratical craft, the Alabama, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864, was read three times and passed.

THANKS TO LIEUTENANT CUSHING.

Mr. GRIMES. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred a similar message of the President recommending a vote of thanks to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, of the United States Navy, to report a joint resolution; and if there be no objection I will make the same motion in regard to it, that the Senate now proceed to its consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. No. 84) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, United States Navy, and to the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albemarle, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864, was read three times and passed.

DISTRICT COURT OF INDIANA.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 352) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it back with amendments. The only object of the bill is to hold a special term of the district court in the State of Indiana, which has been rendered necessary in consequence of the decease of the judge, and as the term is fixed for an early day, at the request of the Senators from that State, I ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. BROWN. Is the bill going to give rise to discussion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. None at all. It merely proposes to authorize the holding of a special term of the court.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that a special session of the United States district court for the State of Indiana shall be holden at the usual place of holding the court on the third Tuesday of December, 1864.

The second section provides that all suits and proceedings of a civil or criminal nature now pending in, or returnable to, the court, shall be proceeded in, heard, tried, and determined by the court at the special session in the same manner as at a regular term, and the judge is empowered to order the impaneling of a petit and grand jury for the session.

The third section provides that the judge of a district court may, at any time, order a special session upon due notice, given in such manner as he may by order direct, for the transaction of any business embraced in the order directing the special session.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out, at the end of the first section, the following words, "the third Tuesday in December, in the year of our Lord 1864," and to insert in lieu thereof, "the first Tuesday of January, 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the third section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the title of the bill was amended by striking out the words "and for other purposes," so as to read: A bill authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

RAIDS FROM THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I see in this morning's paper the following announcement:

"TORONTO, December 13.—The St. Albans raiders have been discharged for want of jurisdiction. There is much excitement."

I desire to offer a couple of resolutions this morning bearing upon this subject, one of them particularly; but I do not expect to make the Senate understand the state of feeling that exists on the Canadian border. I have a great number of letters in my possession from gentlemen living upon that border. In my own city, which is within musket range of the Canadian shore, thousands of the citizens have been under arms for a long time, and we have been under a continuous state of alarm for fear of incendiaries, murderers, burglars, and robbers from the Canadian frontier. From the announcement that I have read it would seem to appear that the Canadian authorities have made up their minds to protect these raiders. As I understand it, a man goes from the South to Canada with a commission purporting to be issued by Mr. Davis, enlists his raiding party, crosses the frontier, murders, robs, burns, destroys, returns again to Canada, and is there protected by the authorities. The letters which I have in my possession are all bearing upon that point. The one I now hold in my hand is from one of our most respectable citizens in the city of Detroit, a gentleman of great wealth, of high political and social position, and who earnestly desires to avoid a difficulty with Great Britain at this time. He says:

"The anxiety growing out of the mist and doubt enshrouding every rumor that reaches us is not to be endured, and upon some slight provocation, one of these days, regardless of neutral lines, our people will be found in Canada engaged in some act that the Canadian Government will say is wrong, and, sooner or later, war will be the result; this we do not want."

Again he says:

"Will you give it your attention, for I think it involves, sooner or later, if not properly heeded, war with England."

As I said when I commenced, I have no expectation of making the Senate comprehend this state of excitement, this intense state of feeling which exists on that border. Vermont may, for ought I know, quietly submit to have her towns robbed and burned and her citizens murdered, but the Northwest will not. The people cannot be restrained unless the Government takes prompt and immediate action upon this subject; and I desire to offer the following resolution on the subject. It may not meet the views of the Senate, but I offer it for the purpose of having the subject referred to a committee; and I have another to follow it:

Whereas raids have been organized in the Canadas and Nova Scotia, and men enlisted in said British provinces by men purporting to hold commissions from the rebels of the United States for the purpose of robbing and murdering peaceable citizens of the United States; of burning cities and villages, of piratically capturing merchant vessels and murdering their crews, being a general system of murder, arson, robberies, and plunders of the peaceable and unarmed citizens of the United States; and whereas the people of the British provinces seem disposed to protect these thieves, robbers, incendiaries, pirates, and murderers, not only in their individual capacity, but by the quibbles of the law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of immediately enlisting an Army corps to watch and defend our territory bordering on the lakes and Canadian line from all hostile demonstrations.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution will lie over until tomorrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the resolution be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECLAMATION ON GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had hoped that that resolution would pass unanimously this morning; but as it is objected to, of course it must lie over. I now offer the following resolution:

Whereas at the commencement of the present rebellion the United States were at peace with the Governments of the world, and upon terms of comity and good-will with Great Britain; and whereas that nation, before the arrival on her soil of our minister accredited by the administration of President Lincoln, precipitately acknowledged the rebels as belligerents, thus recognizing their flag upon the ocean, without which recognition it would have been regarded and treated as piratical by all other Powers; and whereas she then proclaimed perfect neutrality between a Republic with which she had entertained friendly relations for upward of half a century and its treasonable subjects; and whereas numbers of her subjects, with the knowledge of her Government, commenced fitting out British fast-sailing ships, loaded with munitions of war, for the purpose of running into our blockaded ports to the rebels, thus furnishing them the means of organizing and continuing the rebellion, and without which it could not have sustained itself six months; and whereas, in addition to the above, and with the knowledge of the Government, British subjects and members of Parliament engaged in the manufacture of piratical English ships, owned by British subjects, manned by British seamen, and sailing under British colors, for the purpose of burning, destroying, and utterly driving from the ocean all peaceful merchant vessels sailing under the United States flag; and whereas many private and unarmed American ships have been burned and destroyed by these pirates from British ports, thus causing great loss and damage to the citizens of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed immediately to make out a list of each ship and cargo thus destroyed, with a fair and separate valuation thereof, and interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the date of capture or destruction to the date of presentation, and that he be directed to demand from the British Government payment in full for all ships and cargoes destroyed as aforesaid.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution at the present time. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it will lie over.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the resolution be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 595) to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831; and

A joint resolution (No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill, which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 465) for the relief of Deborah Jones.

ST. LOUIS ARSENAL.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act of Congress of March 2, 1861, entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located," and report by bill or otherwise.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 354) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and regulating the disposal of lands heretofore granted said State to aid in the construction of such roads, be printed for the use of the Senate.

INCREASE OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to take up the resolution that I offered the other day, which upon the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] was laid over. The Senator from Michigan, I believe, did not understand fully the purport of the resolution. It is merely one of inquiry, and I understand he has now no objection to its being passed. It will give rise to no discussion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. DOOLITTLE on the 12th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the propriety of the immediate passage of an act to increase the revenue, first, by an additional tax of one per cent. upon all sales of real and personal property, including also all bargains for the sale of merchandise, produce, gold or silver coin, or stocks of any description; second, by an additional tax of twenty-five per cent. upon the gross receipts, to be added to the present rates, of all railroad fares, including street railroads, steamboats, and ferries, to be collected by the companies or persons running the same for the use of the Government. And that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the propriety of the passage of a law to prevent the further expansion of the currency by the organization of any new banking associations except when they may take the place of some existing State bank. And that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the propriety of redeeming all the outstanding interest-bearing legal-tender notes, by issuing in their stead other notes, in denomination not less than fifty dollars each, bearing a uniform interest, from the 1st day of January in each year, of three and sixty-five one hundredths per cent. per annum, with coupons attached, to be paid out, and to be made a legal tender for their face, with interest added.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call the attention of the members of the Committee on Finance specially to the points mentioned without at all entering into a discussion. The resolution instructs the committee to inquire into the propriety of a tax on all sales both of real and personal property. According to the lowest estimate which can be made, that of itself would produce a revenue of $75,000,000 every year. It not only proposes a tax upon sales actually made, but upon all bargains or contracts to sell stocks, gold, and produce, which will have more of a restraining effect upon speculations in gold than any gold bills which can be passed making it a penal offense to sell gold in the market, or to make any distinction between gold and paper currency.

It also proposes that the committee shall inquire into the propriety of adding twenty-five per cent. tax to all the railroad fares in the country, including street railroads, steamboats, and ferries, and making the companies the tax-gatherers for the benefit of the Government. Here is a source of income and of revenue which is the most immediately accessible, perhaps, of any upon which the Government can lay its hand. It will be received in large quantities from powerful companies, rich companies, and the revenue to flow into the Treasury of the Government will be immense. And this is the time, Mr. President, of all others, when we should seize hold of those means which will produce the revenue, for the money we must have.

Another point in the resolution is an inquiry whether it is not best to prevent the organization of any more new banking associations with power to put their notes afloat and still further expand the circulating medium, allowing at the same time those State banks that are now in existence, by withdrawing their circulation, to go into operation under the general law.

The fourth point is—and to that I desire specially to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance—to attempt in some way to substitute some notes of the Government in place of all those legal-tender interest-bearing notes which now bear interest from the date of their issue, and the date of their issue may occur in any month during the whole year, producing "confusion worse confounded" in all money transactions so far as concerns the computation of the interest that may have accrued on these notes between individuals as they pass from hand to hand. In their stead, I should like to substitute interest-bearing legal-tender notes for a uniform rate of interest, bearing date from a given date within a year, for instance the 1st day of January; bearing an interest of 3.65 per cent., which can easily be calculated: upon $100, a cent a day; upon $50, half a cent a day; and bearing interest from that given day, no matter when issued by the Government, and to be a legal tender not only for the face but for the accrued interest, so that when the Government pays them out it pays them out for their real value, and then they pass from hand to hand, and any individual who happens to take them takes them for the face and the interest, and if he chooses to keep them in his hands they are all the while accumulating.

Mr. President, I have simply called the attention of the Committee on Finance to these four points; I do not intend to go into a discussion of them. I deem each and every one of them exceedingly important; and it is still more important that we act, or, if possible, that we induce Congress to act upon this great subject of finance, even before we take the usual adjournment for the holidays. I do not know that it is possible for this body to originate any bill on this subject; but the committee may inquire into it, and can report upon these questions. It is for the other House to originate revenue measures, I am aware; but I hope that it is possible that this Congress, before we take the Christmas adjournment, can pass some revenue measure that shall bring money into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is taken upon the passage of the resolution, I will say a word or two, but not detain the Senate. I have no objection to the reference of the resolution, but will state that the Committee on Finance have already had this subject under consideration by the reference of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President's message. All the points indicated by the Senator's resolution will be considered in the Committee on Finance without the resolution.

I desire further to say that, while it is well enough for Senators to submit their propositions upon this subject, yet we are restrained in our action by the provision of the Constitution which requires that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. At the last session the Senate attempted to indicate its desire to increase the tax on incomes, and sent a proposition of that kind, as an amendment to one of the military bills, to the other House, but it was resented by the House, the bill was laid upon the table, and they sent us back a new proposition. I think, therefore, we ought to avoid any controversy with the House of Representatives upon a matter the origination of which the Constitution vests in them exclusively. We must await their action. They will, necessarily, soon send to the Senate bills providing additional revenue, and then we can propose amendments of various kinds increasing the taxes.

I desire now to say for myself that I believe the true remedy for our financial difficulties is a very large increase of taxes. Perhaps my views in this respect will not be sustained by the Senate. From the beginning of the war I have thought that the true mode was to pay as we go, as far as possible. There are various reasons for this; I will state but one that operates very strongly on my mind. The soldiers that are serving in the field are enduring all the hardships of this war; those at home are more prosperous than ever before; persons engaged in ordinary business are now doing better than they have done for years; and I think it but right that they who are now reaping profits from the condition of war should pay very largely in taxes in order to bear their share of the burdens of a great war. If we increase our national debt, and put these taxes upon future generations, we compel the descendants of the very soldiers who have fought our battles also to pay the expenses of the war. I think we ought to be willing to endure a very large amount of taxation, far in excess of any we have had heretofore.

At the proper time, when these questions properly come before the Senate, the Senator will have an opportunity to present his views on the various details connected with the general subject of taxation, and they will then be fully considered; but at present we are not able to act upon them, and shall not be until bills come to us from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should have no objection to the reference of this resolution especially, to the Committee on Finance, if it was introduced simply for the purpose of setting forth the views entertained by the Senator from Wisconsin, and of indicating the direction in which he thought inquiry should be made; but if it is going to that committee by general consent, and is to be taken as any indication that the Senate concur in the suggestions made, I wish for one to say that I do not, that I differ very widely in regard to the policies which he has indicated and the effects to flow from them which he seems to anticipate.

I will add only one other word, and say this, that I think gentlemen are perhaps somewhat mistaken in regard to the extent to which taxation can be carried, and that we are perhaps nearer the limit at which it can be properly borne than many persons imagine. I think that in the conduct of this war, in the carrying on of our system for the future, we have got to look in another direction; in other words, it has become an expense account, and we have got to look to a reduction of expenditure to enable us to sustain our financial system. I believe that is a direction in which inquiry should more properly be made. I do not desire to oppose the passage of the resolution, but simply to say that I trust it will be taken as no indication, in regard to the points mooted, of a general concurrence on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I agree with the Senator from Missouri entirely in what he says, that it is necessary to reduce the expenses in every possible way, and I will go with him in the effort to reduce them, and to compel the administration of every department of the Government on principles of the strictest economy possible. At the same time, our necessary expenses are so great and must be so great that we are compelled to seize hold of every source that will certainly bring us revenue; and while I do not expect, of course, that the Senate, by allowing this resolution to go to the committee now, express their opinion on the points I have presented, still the points are of sufficient consequence and magnitude to be well considered by the committee, and therefore I hope the resolution will pass without any objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I do not rise to prolong the discussion; I only wish to say one word, and that is, one of the most certain modes of promoting economy in our affairs is to make the people pay as we go.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (No. 595) to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that resolution ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. GRIMES. I do.

Mr. SUMNER. It refers to a treaty.

Mr. GRIMES. It refers purely to commercial relations existing between this country and the provinces of Great Britain.

Mr. SUMNER. Then every question of commerce between the two countries, even if it is the subject of negotiation, must be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and you may as well dismiss your Committee on Foreign Relations. That subject is at this moment under the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was referred by the Senate several times during the last session by several different resolutions and petitions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Iowa that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The question being put, the motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that those matters which were pending at the adjournment of the last session of Congress, with the papers accompanying them, be referred by the Chair to their appropriate committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order is already made.

Mr. COLLAMER. Some question has arisen among us about the referring of papers to the committees. I understand that by the rule of the Senate the business is to be taken up in the state of completion in which it was when we adjourned at the last session. I take it, of course, that those bills which were reported and on the Calendar at the close of the last session are not again to be sent to the committees, but the Senate will take them up in the order in which they stood on the Calendar at the time of our adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand, then, that according to the rules all those matters which were in the hands of the committees, not reported upon, are to be again sent to the committees, with the accompanying papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All unfinished business before the committees at the adjournment of the last session goes back to the committees, of course.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 14, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BOWMAN, Chaplain of the Senate. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECIPROCITY TREATY—RECORDING VOTES.

Mr. KASSON. I ask leave to record my vote on the passage of the joint resolution authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating the treaty made by Great Britain on behalf of the British provinces in North America.

Mr. STEVENS. Before this permission be granted, I would like to inquire whether it is true that the Canadian authorities have discharged all the rebels whose cases have been under investigation there.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is so stated in a dispatch from Toronto.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope that all gentlemen who voted against the bill will change their votes and make the passage of the bill unanimous.

Leave was granted to Mr. KASSON to record his vote, and he voted in the affirmative.

MESSRS. DEMING, DRIGGS, BLAIR, and LONGYEAR obtained similar leave, and voted in the affirmative.

MESSRS. J. C. ALLEN, LE BLOND, and KALBFLEISCH obtained similar leave, and voted in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, obtained leave to change his vote on the same question, and voted in the affirmative.

NATURALIZATION OF SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 583) to so amend the law in regard to the naturalization of soldiers as to include sailors also in its provisions.

On motion of Mr. WILSON the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The substitute reported by the committee was read. It provides that the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be so amended as to read as follows:

That any alien of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has enlisted or shall enlist in the armies of the United States, either the volunteer or regular forces, or in the naval or marine forces, and has been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States upon his petition without any proof of the declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and that the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to the proof of residence and good moral character as is now provided by law, be satisfied, by competent proof, or such person having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amended title, as reported by the committee, was agreed to as follows:

A bill to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] whether this bill contains any other provisions than those necessary to carry out existing laws.

Mr. STEVENS. It is simply a bill to pay pensions authorized by law. It contains no other provisions.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that this bill be made a special order for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC EXPENSES.

Mr. STEVENS also reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make the same inquiry in reference to this bill that was made with regard to the other—whether it contains any appropriation not authorized by existing law.

Mr. STEVENS. It does not; it contains no appropriations but such as are authorized by laws already existing.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that this bill also be made a special order for to-morrow. They are both short bills.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIP CANAL AROUND NIAGARA FALLS.

The SPEAKER. The first bill in order is a bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, postponed from last session until this day.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the consideration of that bill be postponed, and that it be made the special order for Tuesday, the 24th day of January, after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. And be continued from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not proposed to make it a special order.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BROOKS. Has the subject been disposed of?

*The SPEAKER. It has not; the question of postponement being still pending.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask that it be made a special order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is required to make it a special order, except on Mondays.

The motion to postpone was then agreed to.

PROTECTION OF CANADIAN FRONTIER.

Mr. BROOKS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of forthwith providing, by negotiation or otherwise, for the protection of our Canadian and provincial frontier from murder, arson, and burglary, under the pretense of rebel invasion.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President to the two Houses of Congress at the present session, together with the accompanying documents, as relates to public edifices and grounds in the city of Washington, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SHIP CANAL.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be a bill (H. R. No. 322) to construct a ship canal for the passage of armed naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes, reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] from the Committee on Roads and Canals, and the further consideration of which was postponed until Tuesday, December 13.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move that the same order be made in reference to that bill that was made in reference to the bill for a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. To what day does my colleague propose to postpone it?

Mr. ARNOLD. To the same day.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

The SPEAKER stated that the Calendar having been exhausted, the next business in order was a call of the committees for reports.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Ways and Means shall have the privilege of reporting at a subsequent period of the day.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

REPEAL OF COMMUTATION CLAUSE.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the remonstrance of J. L. Reilly, and two hundred others, against the repeal of the commutation clause; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

UNEMPLOYED GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 586, to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee recommend an amendment to strike out the 1st and substitute the 15th day of February.

Mr. COX. I will ask my colleague whether this is the same bill which was proposed by him at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to explain. The first section is the same, with only the change of date, so as to make it prospective now as it was then.

There is, however, a second section to make the bill continuous in its operation, so that on the last day of next February, and the last day of each month thereafter, there shall be a revision of the rolls of the Army, and all general officers who may be found on the last day of any month not to have been employed in any way corresponding to their rank, for the three months then next preceding, shall be dropped as provided in other cases in the first section. The effect of the second section is to make the bill continuous in its character. That is the only amendment to the bill of last year.

Mr. COX. I remember when my colleague introduced his bill at the last session, my friend from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] as well as myself, offered amendments. I do not know whether they are pertinent to this bill or not; and I want to understand whether this is entirely a new bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is a new bill.

Mr. COX. What has become of the old one? Mr. SCHENCK. That bill hangs in the Senate. The old joint resolution, for this is a bill and that was a joint resolution, is substantially the same with the exception of the date.

Mr. COX. I would have no objection to vote for this bill, provided the proper guards are thrown around it by which the officers who are to be dropped shall have a fair trial. That was the amendment of my friend from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] at the last session. The President of the United States can now, at any time, drop any of these officers for incompetency and inefficiency.

I have not learned the necessity, since the last session of Congress, of passing this measure, when the head of the Army has already the right to drop these officers. I do not know why the Senate does not pass the bill sent to them by this House; perhaps my colleague can inform me. They may have some reason for not passing it that the minority did not comprehend last year. I would ask my colleague to state, if he knows, why it is that the Senate does not pass it.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is as much as I can do to answer for the action of this House so far as I am concerned as one of its component parts. I certainly cannot tell why the Senate does or does not legislate upon any given subject.

Mr. COX. I think my question was hardly a proper one to my colleague, and I withdraw it. But I am opposed to the measure.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to reargue the merits of the proposition reported from the Military Committee. The joint resolution, as passed by us last session, was discussed until no one seemed desirous of discussing it any longer; and amendments were proposed and disagreed to by the House. The joint resolution was passed, but the evil continuing to a very considerable extent, though not to quite so great an extent as at that time, and the committee, not knowing why the Senate have not acted upon that joint resolution, have embodied the substance of it in a section of the bill they have now reported. They have further added to the provision a section which will make the operation of the bill continuous in its application. There are no new principles involved, no new questions to be raised, and as the subject was thus discussed last session, and subsequently presented to the House again by the committee, I will move the previous question upon the passage of this bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question occurred on the amendment to strike out "1st of February" and insert "15th of February;" and it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 38, not voting 45; as follows:

Harris, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Loan, McBride, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Nelson, Odell, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Strouse, Sweet, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—45.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJOR WILLIAM H. JAMESON.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 329) for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army.

The bill, which was read, requires the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to allow Major William H. Jameson, on settlement, a credit of $959 14, for money in his hands as paymaster of the Army, on board the steamer Ruth, destroyed by fire on the night of the 4th of August, 1863.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. A bill passed both Houses of Congress at the last session, in connection with which there was a full investigation of the circumstances attending the burning of the steamer Ruth, and a credit was given to Major N. S. Brinton of $2,600,000, for currency which was in wooden boxes, burned on board that steamer.

It was also in evidence before the committee, as will be found in the printed report of last session, that there were several paymasters' safes on board the Ruth at the time of her destruction, and that these were in part recovered, and that some fragments of bills, not entirely destroyed, were delivered up to the Treasury agent. This bill has reference to one of the paymasters, who had his money in one of these safes. There was only about nine hundred dollars of it, and he had paid out of that sum about two hundred and fifty dollars to two officers whose names he had entirely forgotten, and the vouchers for these payments were in the safe and were destroyed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me, this, I believe, is one of a class of cases in regard to money which was lost on board the Ruth. During the last days of last session this House passed a bill, which I think became a law, for the relief of Major N. S. Brinton, but that bill contained a provision which is not in this bill, but which I shall ask leave to have incorporated in it, that the case should be examined by the Paymaster General, and that the allowance of the credit should be subject to his approval.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not remember such a provision in the bill, though it may be there. The gentleman will find it on page 10 of the Private Acts of the last Congress.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, I know that the House put that provision in.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection at all to having it inserted in this bill. It has passed the Senate, and has been examined by the Committee on Military Affairs. On comparing the facts in this case with the report in the other case, we find that it belongs to the same class.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is not understood that this matter has already been fully examined at the Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has passed through all the Departments of the Government, and they have referred the party to Congress as his only remedy. The evidence is full and satisfactory that this money was utterly destroyed except such payments as were returned to the Treasury agent who was on the ground when the divers examined the wreck, and those were returned to the Treasury and destroyed, so that fraud is hardly possible.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio referred me to the act in relation to Major Brinton, and I understood him to say that it did not contain any such provision as I suggested.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not looked at the act. It may be there.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will read the act:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to allow Major N. S. Brinton, on the settlement of his accounts, a credit of $2,600,000 for money in his hands as paymaster in the Army, on board the steamer Ruth, and destroyed by fire on the night of the 4th of August, 1863."

Now, this is the part of the act to which I referred, and I thought I was not mistaken:

"if, on examining the evidence by the Paymaster General, he, the said Paymaster General, shall deem him justly entitled to such credit; but such credit shall not be allowed without the said Paymaster General shall certify his approval thereof."

That is an amendment which I drew up. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] accepted it, and the House embodied it in the law. I only desire to have this claim put upon the same footing, and I presume the gentleman will have no objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the bill, as introduced by the Military Committee of the House, did not contain the clause which he has read; I remember now that the bill that finally passed came from the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I knew that I was not mistaken. If the gentleman from Ohio will consent to this amendment, I will offer no further opposition to his bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will do so. Let that clause be added to the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The amendment is, to add to the bill the words, "if, on examining the evidence by the Paymaster General, he, the said Paymaster General, shall deem him justly entitled to said credit; but such credit shall not be allowed without the said Paymaster General shall certify his approval thereof."

Mr. GARFIELD moved the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was first on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

COMMISSION ON TAXATION.

The House proceeded, as the first business on the Speaker's table, to the consideration of a joint resolution (S. No. 78) providing for the appointment of a commission on the subject of raising revenue by taxation.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inquire and report, at the earliest practicable moment, as to the best and most efficient mode of raising, by taxation, such additional revenue as may hereafter be found necessary to supply the wants of the Government, having regard to the sources from which the same shall be derived, and gives power to the commission to take testimony in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and appropriates such sum as may be necessary to defray the expenses of the commission, including the pay of witnesses.

The SPEAKER. On the 4th of July last the previous question was ordered on the passage of the joint resolution. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LeBlond] moved that the joint resolution be laid on the table. On that motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and the House then adjourned. The question is now on the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. If the motion to lay on the table be voted down will not the question then be on the passage of the joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to inquire if we have not got a committee of the House for the very purpose contemplated by the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House is acting under the previous question.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 65, not voting, 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Fluck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Griswold, Herrick, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Kelley, Littlejohn, Longyear, McAllister, McBride, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, Townsend, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, and Windom—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baily, Baxter, Blaine, Brooks, William G. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Creswell, Dawes, Dumont, Fenton, Gooch, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, King, Knox, Law, Lazear, Loan, Marcy, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Nelson, Odell, Patterson, Perry, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Strouse, Sweet, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—48.

So the joint resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was laid on the table, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVENUE CUTTERS FOR THE LAKES.

The SPEAKER. The next bill on the table is Senate bill No. 350, to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes.

The bill was read a first and second time. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to construct or purchase and alter not exceeding six steam revenue cutters for service on the lakes, and appropriates $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This bill contains an appropriation of money, and if there be any objection to its consideration, it must, as a matter of course, go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I hope, however, that the House will hear read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject which I send to the Clerk's desk, and that there will be no objection to the immediate passage of this bill for the protection of our commerce and to prevent smuggling on the lakes.

The SPEAKER. As this bill contains an appropriation, it will require unanimous consent for its consideration by the House at the present time. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The Clerk read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, requesting information as to the number of revenue cutters now on the lakes, their efficiency, and the necessity for their increase.

The number of cutters heretofore maintained on the northern lakes was six. They were sailing vessels, and of such build and rig as to prevent their cruising with efficiency. In 1861 five of them were directed to be brought down the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic coast, in the hope that they might be used advantageously in the preventive service. One was left upon the lakes, but found to be worthless, and sold. During the last winter a contract was made with parties to build an efficient steamer for revenue service on Lake Erie, which vessel is so nearly completed that her trial trip has been ordered for to-day. This is the only steamer belonging to the Government applicable to revenue purposes on all the lakes.

The necessity, however, for preventing smuggling along our northern frontier, which the Government has satisfactory evidence is carried on to a great extent, induced the Secretary to charter two steamers for temporary service, one on Lake Erie and one on Lake Ontario. One of these vessels was lost on entering the harbor of Cleveland, and the charter of the other has expired and she has gone out of service.

I therefore recommend that authority be given to build or purchase five efficient steam vessels for the use of the revenue department on the northern lakes, which, in addition to the one just completed, will make the number of cutters previously employed.

It is possible that the number here recommended may not all be required. The great length of the coast to be guarded, and in some parts its close proximity to the Canadian shore, demand constant vigilance, and the proper authority should be conferred to meet all contingencies.

If possible such vessels should be completed and commissioned by the opening of navigation.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JOHN SHERMAN.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill by the House at the present time? The Chair hears no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it in order to move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir; that motion would take precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BROOKS. I make that motion.

A MEMBER. Say till the 4th of January.

Mr. BROOKS. The Constitution forbids that; otherwise I would.

The motion of Mr. Brooks was not agreed to.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 82, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Gooch, Grider, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Longyear, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, James R. Morris, Morrison, Norton, John O'Neill, Pike, John H. Rice, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wilson—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Herrick, Higby, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Philip Johnson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Law, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, McKinney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Sloan, Starr, Stiles, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Townsend, Tracy, Upson, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, and Windom—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bliss, Blow, William G. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Dumont, Fenton, Garfield, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, King, McBride, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Nelson, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Scofield, Strouse, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—45.

So the House refused to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which they asked the concurrence of the House:

A bill (No. 352) to authorize the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana;

Joint resolution (No. 83) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in her conflict with the piratical craft, the Alabama, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864;

Joint resolution (No. 84) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, United States Navy, and to the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albatross, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864.

SURVIVING SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that it will be the understanding that no business shall be done.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be the annual message of the President relative to the condition of the country.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that all preceding orders be laid aside, and that the committee take up House bill No. 266, granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, which was introduced by me at the last session.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by disposing of the preceding bills one at a time.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to move to take up the question of taxing whisky on hand? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time; it is too early in the day.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the annual message of the President be laid aside.

The motion was disagreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I intimated my design, when the President's annual message was received, to make some remarks on it; but I have lost some of the interest which might have been inspired at that moment. And yet if I do not take advantage of this opportunity now, when there is nothing to do, the topics of the message may pass beyond my reach, so that little time may be left for me to say anything if the message should ever come up again. I avail myself, then, of this early period of the session not to waste time, and when it is the good fortune of the House and of the country not to have anything to do.

There are, sir, two cardinal topics in the message of the President to which I wish particularly to solicit attention; and these are, first, that the war must go on without further negotiation; and, second, that the war must go on until the abolition of slavery is made perpetual throughout all portions of the old United States.

Mr. GRINNELL. I make the point of order that it is not in order to discuss the President's message of this year upon the Calendar of the last session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BROOKS. I intend to discuss the President's message of this year, and the topics therein set forth. Permit me, first, to call the attention of the House to the numerous amendments which are proposed to the Constitution. One of them is to change the principle of representation, proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN;] another is to change the great principle of the Constitution as to export duties, proposed by the honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS;] and another comes down to us from the Senate, with the sanction of the President of the United States, and that is, to alter the Constitution on the subject of slavery. No time seems to me more inauspicious than in the midst of civil war, with the clangor of arms all around us, with comparatively but a small territorial part of our whole country assembled by their Representatives upon the floor of this House; no time, sir, seems to me more inauspicious to make great fundamental changes of the Constitution of the United States.

But it is said that slavery is the stumbling-block in the way of the restoration of the Union, and that without the abolition of slavery it is not possible for us, now or hereafter, to live on terms of amity and peace with our former southern countrymen. I do not now, or at any time this session, propose to rediscuss this topic of slavery. I have nothing new to say upon it, or but little to take back. I adhere to the opinions which I have heretofore advanced on that subject on the floor of this House, and, in the main, to the opinions which I have held for twenty-five to thirty years, and which some not unkind friend has reproduced for the reading of the House from a newspaper I wrote for, years and years ago. These opinions are but little changed. I do not, however, intend to discuss the abstract question of slavery at all, or its political or constitutional connections with the Government of the land.

The approval of the system of slavery, Mr. Chairman, and the acceptance of it as an institution existing, are very different things. I accept it, if I do not approve. The Constitution of my country teaches me to be tolerant in all things, even in the most important of all matters, that of religion. Intolerance is criminal at all times; but intolerance is repelled under our form of Government in every line and letter of the Constitution under which we live; and if the Constitution did not teach me that, the Bible does. Sir, when the Saviour was on earth He lived under a Government where there were sixty million slaves; and when, from the Mount of Olives, He ascended into heaven, His eyes looked down upon Jerusalem and Judea, full of thousands and tens of thousands of slaves. And when the Apostle Paul stood upon Mars' hill, after wandering among the magnificent temples of the Acropolis, some of them dedicated to the unknown God, he preached to the Athenians, surrounded by their masses of slaves, no intolerance, no persecution, no civil war for the abolition of slavery; but if not there, elsewhere, Servants, obey your masters. The teachings of our Saviour were also to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's, with submission to civil government and the Christian obedience even of slaves to their masters. The whole spirit of the evangelists is full of like toleration to an institution which, in the end, the lessons of Christianity were to subvert, but the overthrow of which, by violence and force, is there everywhere condemned.

If, then, the Saviour of the world and His apostles were thus tolerant upon the subject of slavery, why cannot there be equal toleration among His professed people in their administration of the Government in this country? Toleration, indeed, is the essential principle of our institutions. Toleration pervades every part of our social organizations. We are tolerant of the Jew, who does not believe in the Saviour. We are tolerant of those Christians who do not respect our Sabbath. We are tolerant of a great and rising State in the center of this continent, which has now one hundred and twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and a city of twenty thousand people. We are tolerant there upon the subject of polygamy, expressly forbidden in the New Testament, if tolerated in the Old; tolerant, though expressly forbidden by the Saviour and His apostles; and these people from this great Territory are admitted to a seat upon the floor of this House, and take part in our deliberations and debates, while we are in a frightful civil war now seemingly only to abolish negro slavery.

And now are we to be told at this day and hour that we cannot be tolerant upon this subject of slavery, when not only the Saviour and apostles tolerated it, but when the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were holders of bondmen and bondwomen? Let me not be misunderstood; I do not mean to be understood as saying that the spirit of the Bible upholds slavery, and I do not mean to say there are not teachings in the sermons of our Saviour and the apostles which in the end would abolish slavery through the whole earth; but I do mean to say that not only the Saviour and the apostles, but that the fathers of the Church were tolerant with slavery, and that for more than a thousand years the fathers of the Church exercised a religious and political influence through the emperors of Rome in upholding the institution of slavery from abolition by force or violence, while they left it to be abolished by the peaceful and graceful influences of Christianity.

Mr. PRICE. As the gentleman quotes scripture so glibly, and refers to the fathers of the Church so readily, I wish to ask him if he has read where it is written that the time of this ignorance was winked at, but that now He commands all men, everywhere, even McClellan Democrats, to repent?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know who has given the gentleman any superior wisdom that enables him to say that this is a wiser age than the age of our Saviour, of the apostles, and of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob.

I was about to say that the Church was over a thousand years in abolishing Roman slavery. And yet here in six months, by constitutional proclamation, or in five or six years by civil war, we propose to abolish it in blood and by violence through an empire almost as vast as the empire of Rome. Slavery was not abolished in England until 1102, by the council of London, and in Ireland until 1172, by the council of Armagh. As a matter of admonition, if not for history, let me here state that when, in 451, or 456, in the council of St. Patrick, held in Ireland, there was a proposition from some of the clergy to induce slaves to run away, the thirty-second canon of that council was expressly issued, ordaining that to steal slaves by inducing them to run away was to expose the clergy to be considered as thieves and robbers. The Church, then, while sapping the foundation of slavery, expressly forbade all violence, all wrong.

But homogeneity, we are told, must exist through the hitherto thirty-four States of this Union. The Union cannot exist unless we are a homogeneous people. No matter whether slavery be right or wrong, Christian or unchristian, it must be abolished, we are told, this day and this hour, in order to make us a homogeneous, a united, a one and indivisible people. Sir, homogeneity can never exist in a great nation, among a great people. Look at the great nations now covering large extents of the globe. There is the Russian empire—what an empire! what different institutions, what various tribes! How unlike—unlike in manners, unlike in character, frequently unlike in origin. And there is the great empire of Austria, which, stretching from Italy to Hungary, contains races of all varieties of character. Twelve different languages are spoken in that empire, and its institutions are as diverse as can well be imagined; its people are unlike, various, and different—more different than any people that exist in this country. And there is Switzerland, too, the only republic existing in Europe, except that little one perched on the Apennines—an old republic of twenty-five cantons, in which are spoken three different languages—the Italian, the German, and the French—the debates, at times, in their general congress going on in all these three tongues. The habits, the customs, the costumes, too, of the Swiss are more or less diverse. The canton of Zug varies more from the canton of Neuchâtel than Massachusetts and South Carolina. The religion is Catholic and Protestant, and Protestant of various creeds and characters, and yet in that republic no effort whatsoever has ever been made by that republican people to have homogeneous institutions or one people alike in all respects as to their character. Then there is Great Britain, that vast empire which stretches from the arctic regions of the north to the Ganges and the Himalaya mountains, and which embraces even in India over a hundred million people; what empire is more tolerant than that in its diverse and varied institutions? There is Catholic Canada, with French institutions yet existing there, and with no right of trial by jury among many portions of the people of Canada. In India there are diverse and innumerable religions and peoples; the Hindoos, the Brahmins, the Sepoys. I should but consume time were I even to enumerate them. No nation has been more tolerant of religion, of prejudices, of politics and passion than the British people have been. This vast empire of Britain has only been maintained by the tolerant spirit of the British Parliament and the British Government extending throughout the whole earth, in all the varied domains of that vast empire. No effort has ever been made in England by any edict of the British Parliament at any time, or on any occasion, to have a homogeneous people. There is no centralization, no consolidation there. Even when the Sepoy went to war, civil war, against the empire of Great Britain, because he was compelled to bite greased cartridges contrary to his religion, the empire and authorities of Great Britain respected the miserable prejudices of the Sepoy, abolished the order, and restored peace throughout all that vast empire.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me one word? If I understand the direction of his argument, it relates to the necessity of the abolition of slavery in order to result in the homogeneity of the American people. In connection with his review of European systems, I ask him to explain, if he can consistently with his theory, why it has been found necessary in England, and France, and Denmark, and Russia, and Holland, to abolish the institution of slavery in order to establish satisfactorily to them what they consider the homogeneity of their institutions?

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman cannot yet comprehend the whole course of my argument, but I will answer his question by saying, so far as Great Britain is concerned, that, in my judgment, slavery was abolished in her distant British West India colonies mainly to destroy this country and to rend this Union, and for no other purpose. [Laughter on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. KASSON. How with France, and Denmark, and Holland, and Russia?

Mr. BROOKS. The system of servitude which exists in Russia is not slavery. The people there are not slaves; they are adscripti glebe—servants belonging to the soil—and that system has been changed, or is being slowly changed gradually, and not by civil war. But those institutions were not abolished in order to make or unmake the homogeneity of institutions in Europe, but for other purposes. It would divert me too far, however, from the line of my argument to enter upon that point now.

But, sir, I was about to say that not only throughout the vast empire of Great Britain there existed none of this homogeneity of institutions, but that even in the little islands of Great Britain and Ireland there was no homogeneity there. There is the Celt who speaks one tongue across the Irish Channel; there is the Welshman who looks over across that Channel, and speaking another tongue; then there are Englishmen with their various dialects in Lancashire and Yorkshire and in other counties; and there are the Gaels in Scotland who speak a language utterly incomprehensible to the great mass of the English people. Any man who has traveled over that country, as I did twenty-five years ago with a pack upon my back, throughout the whole of Lancashire and Yorkshire and those border countries, can bear testimony to this fact, that in a day's or half a day's travel among the people in that part of the country, you pass among men whose institutions not only differ far more than the institutions of the North and the South, but you go among a people speaking a language not only incomprehensible to you, but to those who are upon their borders. Thus any traveler who passes beyond the Lowlands, perhaps with some Lady of the Lake for his guide-book, into the Highlands of Scotland, will soon find that as he goes north from Stirling castle he goes among a foreign people, with foreign institutions, speaking tongues far different from those of the great majority of the English people. The wise people of England, the wise Government of England have never attempted to have homogeneity of institutions; not only throughout their vast empire, but even in their own little islands, they have respected the rights, the privileges, the prerogatives of the Welsh, the Celts, the Gaels, and the other varieties of men throughout all parts of England, and it is only by this spirit of toleration, this noble spirit of toleration, this worthy conciliatory spirit of the nation that that vast empire of England has been able to stretch its power beyond its own little domain all over the earth, encircling the globe, as has been well said, by the beat of its drums that greet the rising of the morning sun.

Homogeneity never existed throughout the vast Roman empire. It was not attempted by the dictators of Rome; and it never was attempted subsequently by the emperors of Rome. But autonomy, or self-independence, was the principle on which the great Roman empire was reared and maintained, and not only so, but it was the only principle on which that Government was enabled to sustain itself in its vast aggregation of territory. When Julius Cæsar conquered the Gauls he did not take away from the barbarian people of Gaul their local institutions, their self-government, the government of their chieftains. He left all that to them. And when Pompey invaded the Asiatic cities and subjected them to the Roman empire, he left to those Asiatic cities the government and control of their own local institutions; and their self-government in that manner attached them to the empire. To the Ionians were reserved their archons and prytanes; to the Dorians, their ephori and cosmi; ay, to all the Grecian cities and States, more or less, their local institutions, their magistrates, their self-government, their peculiar institutions. Coining was allowed to some; fiscal regulations to others. Confederations were allowed to exist in Greece long after the domination of the Roman empire. There was not only the well-known Amphictyonic, but the Panionian, the Bæotian, the Achæan. Autonomy, as far as possible, homogeneity seldom, if ever, was the Roman rule. The self-government of the subject States was as much as possible preserved. Their local institutions were maintained and invigorated. And it was by the preservation of their self-government, and of those local institutions, that the vast empire of Rome was maintained for so many years, and was perpetuated from age to age, often even under the worst of emperors.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he did not state in this House at the last session that the institution of slavery was dead in this country.

Mr. BROOKS. I stated in the opening of my remarks that I have nothing to unsay in what I said in that speech.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like a distinct answer to the question which I put.

Mr. BROOKS. My speech is on record; and I have not a word to take back of it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman allow me a single moment?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the statement of the gentleman at last session be a fact, that the institution of slavery is dead, I would like to know how any action of the Government can affect the local institution of slavery in this country.

Mr. BROOKS. Then why should you try to kill a dead body?

Mr. STEVENS. But we ought to bury it lest it become noxious.

Mr. BROOKS. But that is no reason why we should have a wake over it. The whole country has become intoxicated on this subject of slavery, and in the midst of that intoxication this civil war is kept up.

I am calling the attention of the House, Mr. Chairman, to these historical facts because they are perfectly applicable to our times, and to our day. History but repeats itself. There is but little new in the history of man. Man but repeats over what preceding man has done. I was about to say, when interrupted, that the great Augustus Cæsar, whose empire stretched in the west from the pillars of Hercules to the Tigris and Euphrates in the east, from the hundred-gated Thebes in the south to the Ultima Thule of Britain in the north, embracing an empire so vast that Ovid wrote of it, "when Jupiter looked out from the portals of heaven he saw nothing but what was Roman," nil nisi Romanum; that great founder of the Roman empire over millions of human beings, that wise and wonderful man, never attempted any homogeneity of institutions. But, throughout all that vast territory, as far as was possible, there was left to the people of the empire their autonomy or self-government, their local institutions. The Parthian, the Indian, the Scythian, the Sarmatian, the Briton, the Egyptian, each and all had reserved to them their local institutions, their local religions, their local governments. The gods of Egypt and the gods of Gaul, the gods of Athens and the gods of Asia, were worshipped, if not in the Capitol of Rome, at least in its close vicinity. And Augustus Cæsar himself caused sacrifice to be offered in the holy temple of the living God, in Jerusalem. All religions, all policies, more or less, were tolerated, only in subordination to the great head of the empire at Rome. And it was the foundation of that empire in the spirit of toleration that kept it together for hundreds and hundreds of years, and which made the name of Cæsar illustrious, not only throughout that whole land, but sent down that name immortal to all posterity as the name for czars and kaisers in the royal houses of kings and emperors.

I repeat, then, that if we pay attention to the teachings, to these examples of history, we must see that homogeneity is not a possible condition for a great people. Centralization, consolidation, are the English words which we substitute for the term homogeneity. Centralization and consolidation is nothing but unlimited despotism. There is no freedom for the people, no self-government, no municipal government, no household government, no family government under such a system. There is no other government worthy of a free people; there is no other government which can maintain the rights and prerogatives of the people but one which shall be founded on some other principle than that of consolidation and centralization. It was not possible for Rome; it was not possible for Athens; it will not be possible for the Government at Washington, with all the telescopes which they may mount upon the highest pinnacles in this city, to look over the vast territory from Passamaquoddy to the Rio Grande and Oregon, and to regulate the local rights and privileges of the millions and millions of people that not only exist now, but are hereafter to exist throughout this vast territory. Even the Puritans taught us better lessons than consolidation and centralization, though their sons have forgotten that lesson. Liberty was cradled in their municipal institutions; and liberty is cradled in the family, in the county, the town, the city, and the State, and not in the federal central Government. The federal Government is to maintain liberty, but it is not its birthplace, its cradle, its nursing mother. For the cradle of human liberty, I repeat, is in the household, in the family, in the home, in the city, the county, and the State; and wherever other institutions, the product of centralization or consolidation, exist, as in France or in Russia, there must exist despotism.

Mr. L. MYERS. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. L. MYERS. I should like to know if at the last session the gentleman did not tell us that we were taught intolerance by the Puritans.

Mr. BROOKS. That may be true. But they taught us many good things. They had some virtues as well as faults. They were right in their local institutions.

Now I have dwelt thus long upon this subject in order to approach another topic, and that is to say that if this homogeneity, this centralization is persisted in, this war must go on until the subjugation of the South follows. In my judgment no two more fatal errors exist, or have existed, or can exist, than that this is to be a short civil war, or that our hitherto southern countrymen can ever be subjugated to this empire of centralization and consolidation. Civil wars are never short when a people are in earnest, as the people of the North and the people of the South are now; we, in earnest for anti-slavery and consolidation; they, in earnest, as they say, for the maintenance of self-government. No war like that can be ended in ninety days, or in a summer's campaign, but is to be a war of years and years. Whatever we may say of the South, the earnestness of that people, their indomitable and furious character, show that in a war to subjugate them extermination must follow.

All civil wars of like character, and waged with like spirit, have lasted for years. The Peloponnesian war lasted twenty-seven years, and ended in the ruin of Greece. The civil wars of Rome lasted for years and years. The wars of the houses of York and Lancaster lasted thirty years. The war of the German confederation lasted thirty years; and for over forty years raged the civil war in Holland and the Netherlands, when an effort was made by the King of Spain, under the Duke of Alva, to subjugate the people of Holland and the Netherlands to the Inquisition and taxation of Spain. All history shows that our civil war is to be long, if not endless, if it is to be conducted in the spirit in which it is conducted now. It is not to be a war, then, of ninety days, nor of four years, nor of this Administration alone; but it is to be a war to be passed on from Administration to Administration, throughout all time, until the spirit of toleration is once more revived in this country, and we learn to revere the lessons our fathers left to us.

The subjugation of eight million people! It is an utter impossibility; it cannot be done. The outward man may be subjugated. He may be made to bend, to cinge, to bow, to take the oaths of allegiance. With bayonets surrounding him, you may for a time take from him all outward manliness. But the spirit within him, with which God has inspired him, can never be subjugated by mortal man. The soul is indomitable, although you may have the outward profession of obedience. This subjugation can never be even apparently perfected only by the constant outward exhibit of bayonets. But whenever that exhibit is withdrawn insurrection and armed rebellion will follow. This nation may be made a nation of soldiers, but if it be made a nation of soldiers altogether, I repeat again that men of our kith and kin, men of our blood and our soul, men educated in our institutions, and inspired by the education which has been given to us by our ancestors, such men, whether right or wrong, can never be subjugated. God never made the race we are born of to be subjects or slaves.

All Europe—France, England, Russia, all combined—can never subdue my own native State of Maine. You may drive the people from the seacoast, but they will go to the mountains; you may desolate their hills and their valleys, but the spirit of the noble people of that gallant State can never, never be subjugated by the whole earth combined. Eight millions of like men, for like we are, with the same blood coursing in our veins, and spread over territory reaching from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, never, never can be subjugated by men of the same kith and kin. Not only human courage, but climate, soil, and a territory fortified by swamp and forest and malaria all forbid. Every wood in Virginia is a fortress. Every swamp in Carolina and Georgia is a ditch. The vastness of the territory to be subjugated is its great defense. Marion and Sumter in the swamps of South Carolina kept at bay for months the finest infantry of England under Lord Rawdon, and the best cavalry in the world under Colonel Tarleton.

I know that these truths are unpalatable; but it is quite time that they should be preached to our countrymen even if they do not like to hear. They are not new. They have all been preached in the English tongue before, and in another great civil war. I speak but the words which our noble ancestors upon the other side of the ocean spoke in the days of the Revolution, when they said that three millions of Englishmen in the American colonies of Great Britain could never, never be subjugated by the armed empire of England. Subjugation they pronounced to be utterly impossible in 1774-75, as I pronounce it now, in 1864.

But I am asked, "What are we to do? Are we to submit to rebels and the rebellion? Are we to lie down and let the rebels of the South ride over us? Are we to give up this great contest, and to surrender our holy Union and our sacred institutions?" I say, never; no, never! Never, I repeat—never are we to surrender the institutions that our fathers bequeathed us, or the unity that they bestowed upon us. But we are to resort to their lessons and their instructions for the salvation, the redemption, and the reintegration of this Union. What the people of the North desire is reunion and peace. What the people of the South desire is peace, not with dishonor, but peace with honor. We both desire peace; and why not, then, try to agree upon terms? Negotiation is the preliminary step to reconciliation. This is the lesson that our fathers have bequeathed to us. Convention, consultation—these are the great prevailing principles of our Government, and the only principles upon which that Government can be maintained and handed down to our children, unless we intend to be eternally in arms.

Tell me not that I am premature in these remarks. They are the words of Burke, and Fox, and Chatham, and Camden, and other illustrious Englishmen in the beginning of our Revolution, in 1772, in 1774, in 1776, and until the treaty of peace in 1783. Let me call the attention of this House and of the country to some of the motions made in the British Parliament prior to the outbreak of our Revolution in 1776, and pending that Revolution.

In 1774, April 15, Lord North introduced into the House of Commons a bill to provide for the trial of Boston people who might be charged with violating the laws of England, not in Massachusetts, not in Boston, but providing for taking them to England and elsewhere to be tried. Loud was the remonstrance from Boston, and from Massachusetts generally, and from all parts of this then colonial country. But Lord North was sustained; the bill was carried in the House of Commons by a vote of 127 to 44, and in the House of Lords by a vote of 49 to 12.

In 1774, April 19, there was introduced a motion to repeal the tea duty, and Edmund Burke seconded that resolution. But Burke and those who agreed with him did not succeed. The people of England were no more willing to reason then than the people of the North or South are willing to reason now. The proposition was voted down—ayes 49, noes 182.

In 1774, November 30, in the new Parliament, the king sent in a speech adverse to the colonies—utterly adverse to their right to control their local institutions, their right of local self-government. There was great debate upon that; but the address was carried in the House of Commons by a vote of 264 to 73, and in the House of Lords by a vote of 63 to 13.

In 1775, January 20, in the beginning of the outbreak of our Revolution, Lord Chatham made his great effort in the House of Lords to have the British troops withdrawn from the city of Boston—to stop fighting, for fighting had begun in the city of Boston, and try consultation and conciliation with the good people of Massachusetts, in order to avoid the effusion of human blood. But Lord Chatham if heard was not heeded. The proposition was voted down (as a like proposition has been voted down in this House) by a vote of 68 to 18. On that occasion Lord Chatham said:

"Resistance to your act was as necessary as it was just, and your declaration of the omnipotence of Parliament, and your imperious doctrine of the necessity of submission, will be found equally incompetent to convince or enslave your fellow-subjects in America, who feel that tyranny, whether ambitioned by an individual part of the Legislature or the bodies who compose it, is equally intolerable to British subjects."

"I trust it is obvious to your lordships that all attempts to impose servitude upon such men, to establish despotism over such a mighty continental nation, must be vain, must be fatal. We shall be forced ultimately to retract. Let us retract while we can, not when we must."

The proposition of Lord Chatham was supported by Lords Shelburne, Camden, Rockingham, and Richmond, but was supported in vain. The British ministry was deaf to the eloquence of Chatham, and deaf to the reasoning of the surrounding nobility.

Lord Chatham then took another step. He proposed, if the colonies would recognize the supreme Government of England, to invite from the colonies a free gift of revenue; but this was rejected by a vote of 61 to 32.

In 1775, January 29, there appeared before the British Parliament, claiming a hearing, the illustrious Franklin, the well-known Butler, and the distinguished Lee. They asked to be heard at the bar of the House of Commons in behalf of the colonies of the United States, but they were not heard. They were refused a hearing because the British Parliament would not recognize the legal existence of any Congress of the United States.

In 1775, February 2, Lord North moved his address to the king against the colonies; Fox moved to amend that by censuring the ministry, but he failed by a vote of 304 to 105. The address was carried by a vote in the House of Commons of 296 to 106, and in the House of Lords of 87 to 27.

In 1775, March 22, Burke proposed concession, conciliation, and addressed the House on the subject. He was heard undoubtedly with far less patience than I am heard here to-day. His motion was rejected, 270 to 78. Lord North then exclaimed—and the like of which we often hear on the floor of this House—that Burke was but helping the rebellion.

In 1776, Congress petitioned the king to be heard, and the petition was rejected as from an illegal body.

The Duke of Grafton then left the party in power, and joined the Opposition. The address to the king, however, was carried by a vote in the House of Commons of 176 to 72, and in the House of Lords of 75 to 32.

Burke then proposed conciliation again, and asked for the calling of a congress by royal authority to settle the difficulties. His proposition was lost by a large majority. It is a proposition which seems to me at this time, in the omnipotence of our power and the abundance of our victories, ought to come—I will not say from this, but from the other side of the House—that there may be consultation with the people of the South to see whether this horrible effusion of human blood cannot be stopped. But the proposition of Burke was lost by a large majority, although it was supported by Barré, Fox, and others; and Lord North was said at heart to favor Burke's proposition.

Lord North, however, soon after, as an organ of the king and ministry, introduced a bill prohibiting intercourse with the colonies. Martial law was declared, and the proposition was carried by a vote of 112 to 16 in the House of Commons, and 78 to 19 in the House of Lords. And it was about that time that the British ministry resolved not to trust to the people of England, of Scotland, and of Ireland for the restoration of harmony and peace, but to rely upon the Hessians. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel furnished 12,104; the Duke of Brunswick 4,084; the Prince of Hesse 668; and the Prince of Waldeck 670—17,526 Hessians in all. This proposition to employ these Hessians was carried in the House of Commons by a vote of 242 to 88. There exists at this time in Hesse-Cassel a beautiful palace, with beautiful grounds, called Wilhemshoe, and surpasses, in my judgment, Versailles, even, built by the purchase-money of these Hessians—money obtained from the British treasury; but no Englishman looks at it, beautiful as it is, without the blush of shame that the money of England was used to employ Hessians to subjugate the colonies.

In 1778, after Burgoyne's defeat, the people of England, for the first time, began to have some sense of the magnitude of the war they were undertaking.

Mr. BROOMALL. Let me ask the gentleman whether those movements to which he is referring did not lead to the success of the rebellion in the colonies.

Mr. BROOKS. I will say to the gentleman that Lord North, the Earl of Temple, and the Tories of England generally used the very words that we have heard so often on the other side of the House, "You are helping the rebellion." But if these men had been heard and heeded in the beginning of the American Revolution there would have been no war. If the wisdom of Chatham had been confided in the colonies would not have rebelled, and there would have been no separation from Great Britain. It was because the people of England and the ministry would not listen to the admonitions of these wise statesmen that the empire was broken up, and we became independent States instead of loyal colonies.

After the defeat of Burgoyne there once more arose a great debate in the British Parliament, in which Fox and Germaine participated. The words of Fox were admonitory, and so well worth remembering that I will read them. Fox was comparing Germaine to Dr. Sangrado—

"Bleeding, he said, has been his only prescription. Forten years that he has presided over American affairs, the most violent, seeping, tomahawking measures have been taken. If a people deprived of their ancient rights have grown tumultuous, bleed them. If they are attacked with a spirit of insurrection, bleed them. If they fever should have run into rebellion, bleed them, cries the State physician. More blood! More blood! Still more blood!"

This was the remedy of Lord Germaine. I will not say it is the only remedy of any member upon the floor of this House of Congress.

In 1778 Lord North, now awakened to the perils of the empire, proposed a consultation, but it was then too late. He proposed to repeal every anti-colonial act of Great Britain from 1763 to 1778, and he proposed to treat the Congress of the colonies as a body to be consulted. But it was too late. And here I beg gentlemen upon the other side to recall history, to be admonished by it, for history in this day is but a repetition of the past. Holland and France and Spain were awakening, and Franklin and Laurens and Lee and others were in consultation with the rivals of the English monarch, and those monarchs were prepared to interfere in the contest between England and these colonies. Our Congress, aware of its strength for the first time, refused to listen to Lord North. So the storm may be gathering now. Yes, the storm is gathering beyond the Rio Grande—a foreboding storm—and the empire of France established there through Maximilian will soon be stretching its vast arms over the Rio Grande and interfering with these States of America.

But before anybody has interfered, before England, or Holland, or Spain, or France has interfered, I beseech my countrymen, in view of these lessons of history, in the spirit of forbearance and conciliation, to endeavor to end this war, now, when we are strong, and when no foreign arm is actually upraised, the more to rend asunder the Union.

Commissioners were sent to Philadelphia, but sent in vain. The emissaries of France were in Philadelphia, not to heal the breach, but to widen it, and in 1783 England was obliged to grant to these colonies their independence. I advise no such grant; I desire the acceptance of no such proposition. I am indisposed ever to receive such a proffer of peace as that; but at this day, and at this hour, holding up the lessons of history, I beseech this honorable House to study these lessons of history before it is too late, and secure a peace when it can be done by mingled kindness and conciliation as well as by force of arms.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: suppose the Government of the United States should adopt the plan he suggests for restoring peace to the country, and that plan should fail, is the gentleman ready then to wage war against this rebellion until it shall have been crushed and the authority of the Government maintained; or would he then acknowledge the independence of the rebel States?

Mr. BROOKS. Never will I consent to acknowledge their independence. We are one people, one country, and have one destiny; it is written out by the finger of Omnipotence.

Mr. WILSON. With all respect to the gentleman from New York, I desire an answer. I wish to know whether, if these means should fail, the gentleman would then be willing to wage this war for the suppression of the rebellion. If not, what means would the gentleman have the Government adopt?

Mr. BROOKS. I am coming to that. I was about to say, when the gentleman interrupted me, that God made this for one country. Omnipotence seems to have written out for it one destiny and one law. It is written out in the rock-ribbed Alleghenies, which extend from the Hudson almost to the Mississippi; it is written out on the great father of the waters with its hundred thousand miles of navigation. We are made for one people, and what God has put together no man can put asunder.

But more, war is not the remedy; it is not the Christian, it is not the civilized remedy for this disaster and trouble in which we are involved at the present hour. Our first duty is to try conciliation and kindness; our first duty is to imitate the proposition of Burke in the British Parliament—negotiation. If we offer negotiation, and the South refuse to hear negotiation upon just and equitable terms, the South will be divided and we shall be united. The war will then be there a war at the ballot-box, and in the southern country; not here a war of blood and devastation. Our remedy is not the sword, it is not the cartridge-box, until all other remedies whatsoever have been exhausted.

Then, as Christians, if we are Christians, or profess Christianity, our first duty to God, our first duty to our institutions, is to assemble in convention and to try reconciliation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRICE obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. I should like to have a little more time to conclude my remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman have leave to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. Leave can be granted by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. BROOKS. Whenever the day and hour come when Christianity fails to restore peace, when the example of our fathers who assembled in convention fails to restore peace, I shall be ready to mark out the course that I will pursue, and I tell the honorable gentleman again that I never, never will consent to a severance of this Union. I wish to be so understood, not only here, but everywhere. I wish my voice, if possible, to be heard South as well as North. Every human effort that can be made by the arts of peace should be made, and if the Union cannot be restored exactly as it was, in the same words and in the same letters, I am prepared for some other bargain which will again be satisfactory to all sections of this Union.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask whether, in any event, under any circumstances, the gentleman is in favor of maintaining the Union by war against the rebellion.

Mr. BROOKS. I repeat that under no circumstances will I ever consent to ask for a passport to go to Mount Vernon or Monticello or to the tomb of Marshall, or to demand one to go to Concord and Lexington and Bunker Hill. Under no circumstance, if I descend or ascend the Mississippi, will I ever consent to have my baggage examined by the officers of a foreign country upon the banks of that river.

Mr. WILSON. I submit that the gentleman has not answered my question directly. I ask again whether the gentleman is willing, under any circumstances, to secure to himself the enjoyment of the privilege he has mentioned through force of arms against the rebellion.

Mr. BROOKS. If it be necessary; if the South has no reason; if it will hear nothing of peace; if it will obstruct the Mississippi and the Chesapeake, and is determined to take from us the rights which we have had from our ancestors, then a new case will arise; but until that case arises in the rebellion, I do not propose to mark out the course which I will pursue hereafter.

Mr. WILSON. I now ask if in any event, in the new case, he would then be willing to wage war against those now in rebellion against the authority of the Government.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not believe that after any of these efforts for peace there would be any such new case. But, on the contrary, if the war should be persisted in, I am ready and willing to maintain those rights as they have been handed down to us by our ancestors. I know the astuteness of the gentleman from Iowa, and I see the coterie of claqueurs by which he is surrounded in this effort to catch me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BROOKS. I am afraid the gentleman does not give a right interpretation to my words. I mean nothing objectionable to the gentleman. I do not wish to say anything that may be offensive. I think I have expressed myself clearly. What I object to is laying down what I would do in a certain contingency; because what may happen hereafter I cannot say. I cannot lay down a programme for the future; but as explicitly as a man can say it, I have said, and repeat, that under no circumstances will I ever consent to a severance of the Union of these States.

Mr. WILSON. But the gentleman did state a case which may occur in the future, and I ask him again, in the event of that case occurring, is he willing to meet it by force of arms?

Mr. BROOKS. Whenever the South refuses all proffers of peace whatsoever, I am ready, upon the reserved rights of this nation, to maintain its legitimate constitutional authority by force of arms. [Several MEMBERS. "Now you've got it."] There may be various ways of settling the difficulties with the South; even the slave question may be got over. The honorable gentleman from Wisconsin may be gratified by refusing the South the right of representation for its slaves on the three-fifths principle. I think the South would willingly consent to that and to have every negro there count one, as at the North. I think there will be no difficulty about that. I think that the subject of the fugitive slave law, which is so offensive to the great mass of the northern people, may be arranged. I see no essential difficulty in that.

The great object in the formation of the Union was commerce and trade. Commerce and trade formed this Union, not patriotism altogether. It was because of the difficulty of having an equal system of duties between Rhode Island and New York and Connecticut, and between Annapolis, in Maryland, and the eastern coast of Virginia, so as to have one commerce, that this Constitution was made.

We might have a zollverein, as they have in Germany, for the collection of our duties. All those difficulties that exist now between ourselves and our southern countrymen might be adjusted in convention, by peaceable negotiation. But, as I have shown before by the example of nations that have gone before us, in my judgment they never can be adjusted by arms. In the end, as the President of the United States said in his inaugural address, we must come to terms by negotiation.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from New York, with a view to get his opinion on the subject, permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. It is this. The gentleman from New York has run a parallel, instead of a contrast, between this causeless and infamous rebellion and that of our fathers against the English Government for a cause which they avowed with a list of their grievances. He now asserts it as a fact that, with a proper proffer of terms on our part, the Union can be restored. I ask him to give to the House the benefit of his information on that point. What evidence has he got that the South will come back into the Union on any terms consistent with the preservation of the Constitution and the Union? The evidence is what I desire.

Mr. BROOKS. What evidence could I have? If I should speak to some southern man, or if I should write to some southern man, I should, in doing so, be violating the laws of the country. I cannot write to any man in the South. I cannot commune with anybody in the South. That is one of the difficulties of the position.

Mr. KASSON. The distinguished gentleman from New York has affirmed the fact that peace can be restored on that basis. I wish the evidence of the fact on which the whole argument rests.

Mr. BROOKS. Suppose we try. At an early period of the war a gentleman from the State of Georgia, well known in this House, a gentleman who is now vice president of the so-called southern confederacy, made an effort to be heard in the interest of peace, and was refused an audience. Another effort was made from the Canadian frontier, but the President of the United States did not permit it to come to any conclusion. Under the laws of our country, I repeat, it is impossible for an individual legitimately to obtain information from the southern country. Hence it is impossible for me to answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa. All that I can say is—try, try. If we succeed, immortality will rest upon our efforts. If we fail, we shall be right as against the South; and the responsibility will be on southern heads.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that any authorized commission to treat for peace on the basis of the Union has ever been refused to be received by this Government, either from Canada, Fortress Monroe, or elsewhere—any authorized commission to treat for peace on the basis of the Union?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, had a commission which was understood to be for peace, and he was not received.

Mr. KASSON. It is denied by the head of that rebel government himself.

Mr. BROOKS. And is affirmed by Mr. Stephens in a speech which he has made in the South.

Mr. KASSON. I have not seen that speech. I differ with the gentleman from New York on the point of fact.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that at this period of the history of the country it is in vain to make such speeches as I am now making. I make them, not for the present moment, but to sow the seeds of thought and of consideration for the people of this great country. I make them to be considered and dwelt upon hereafter, and I hope that they will lead to reflection throughout the country. I hope the Republican side of the House will cease to cherish that feeling against us on this side of the House in which they have hitherto indulged. We desire Union as much as they do; but we do not see, in their mode and manner of obtaining that Union, any good result possible, and we do not believe that it is possible. I address my remarks to the House, in accordance with my purpose to try and produce some community of feeling, some community of action, which may, hereafter, be useful to our constituents. If I were acting the mere rôle of an Opposition member, I should do nothing but throw obstacles in the way of the other side of the House; but I hold it to be the duty of a man in the Opposition to propose as well as to oppose; and hence the propositions which I have put out.

No man on that side of the House, I call God to witness, desires the reunion of these States more ardently than I desire it. No man would make greater sacrifices than I would make to restore to peace and harmony this now bleeding country. But I speak in vain. I am in a minority on the floor of this House, and will be in a greater minority hereafter. I can only appeal to my countrymen, to their good feeling, to their reason and their sense. To them I appeal as to Americans having a great history, not now, I trust, to end. I appeal more especially to New England men, for independence, self-action, and individuality upon this floor. I appeal to that State in which I was born—the State of Massachusetts—which sometimes thinks and acts for herself, independent even of party chains. Let her step forth and act now on this great occasion, and immortalize herself, as she has heretofore done.

Mr. ELIOT. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] if it is not true that the part of Massachusetts in which he was born belongs now to the State of Maine?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not think the gentleman should ask so impertinent a question as that. The wit of the remark does not compensate for the time of the House occupied by it.

Mr. ELIOT. It has truth in it, at all events.

Mr. BROOKS. I am happy to say that I was not born in that part of Massachusetts which the gentleman represents. These personalities are wholly uncalled for.

There was a period in the history of Massachusetts when that State, great and powerful in her control over the Revolution of 1776, forgetting the rival claims of her own eminent sons, and even forgetful of the good city of Boston, in the person of John Adams nominated a slaveholder, George Washington, of Virginia, to be the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. It is in that spirit that I invoke Massachusetts men to act now; I implore Massachusetts men to look back to these antecedents of their history and emulate the glory of that era. And I also appeal to other New England men upon the floor of this House; and to those who come from the far distant shores of the Pacific I thus appeal, because this Government is now a New England Government, and, in the main, in the hands of New England men.

Throughout the vast regions of the lakes, across the Rocky mountains, the New England element governs and controls this country. I appeal, therefore, to the three New England men from the State of Iowa, and to the honorable gentleman, the leading member from the State of Illinois. I appeal to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the monitor and the Mentor of this House, who was born among the Green mountains of Vermont, and who exercises so omnipotent an influence in controlling the deliberations of this body; to him I appeal for support of this effort to bring peace again to our people. Let us together try to do honor to New England men and New England history, forgetful of those provincialisms which have been fostered by this civil war, and, if possible, accomplish the restoration of this Union.

Oh, that it was within my power to go within the portals of the White House, and to approach the Chief Magistrate there; I would do what, alas! as an impenitent sinner, I do not dare do to my Maker—on bended knees implore him in his now almost omnipotent authority to exercise all the powers of Christianity, all the lessons, all the arts of peace for the restoration of this now divided and broken Union, and to stop the further effusion of human blood. In the name of that great patriot whom we once in common revered, whose voice has been so often heard in the deliberations of this Capitol, in the name of Henry Clay, in whose company, in the better days of the Republic, we both marched together, I would invoke him to remember the history of that great man.

Thrice by efforts of conciliation he averted the evils of civil war. First upon the Missouri question in 1820; then in 1832, in the Senate, by his action upon the tariff, in eloquence which stirred the nation's heart, and which had an omnipotent and controlling influence then over both Houses of Congress, he again stopped the threatened effusion of human blood. And in the great compromise questions of 1850, by his eloquence, his power, his wisdom, his social influence, as well as by his omnipotence in debate, by the respect which all portions of this country had for that great and illustrious man, civil war was again averted from this unhappy land.

Oh, that I could approach the White House, and repeat to the Chief Magistrate the lessons of our illustrious teacher, and invoke him to follow that illustrious example, and to do himself the immortal honor, to be, not the last President of the United States, but the saviour and restorer of this divided, distracted, and bleeding Union.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said that genius is the crowning diadem on the brow of manhood; but if I had ever been induced to believe the declaration, I should have changed my opinion since I became a member of this House. I have listened, sir, as this House has done, frequently—again and again—to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] when he has held spell-bound the members of this body upon questions that have agitated this country from its center to its circumference; and when I have returned to my home on the western bank of the Mississippi, and my constituents have asked me concerning the members and the doings of this House, and when they have asked me the question "Who is the best orator in the lower House of Congress?" I have invariably referred them to the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat. His silvery accents, his smooth sentences, his well-informed mind, enlightened not only from history, but from his travels in foreign lands, qualify him admirably to entertain and to instruct an audience of this or any other kind.

But, sir, I regret to say, and I say it with sincere sorrow, that his ingenuity is equal, if not superior, to his genius. Sir, there is not a man upon either side of this House to-day, who has listened to the honorable gentleman's speech of an hour and a half, his eloquence, his rhetoric, his oratory, but must be satisfied that the entire aim and intent of the whole speech and the desire of the man are that it shall aid the enemies of our country, and as a consequence depress the friends of the Administration and of the Government and of the civil and religious institutions with which we are blessed in this land. Slavery—the very thing that the honorable gentleman told us in that very place at the last session of Congress was dead—slavery is the alpha and the omega of that speech. That speech, I undertake to say, without fear of successful contradiction, is intended to strengthen the hands of the slaveholders and the hands of the rebels; and in just so much as it strengthens their hands it weakens ours, and causes the blood of patriot hearts to flow upon southern soil. No other conclusion can be arrived at.

Sir, I like to meet gentlemen with their own arguments. What I may say in reference to that gentleman or any other gentleman on this floor upon this question would have but a tinge of the weight (if it had so much) that would attach to a declaration coming from the gentleman's self upon this question. And I want nothing stronger, I want nothing clearer, I want nothing more conclusive than what the gentleman who has just taken his seat after his eloquent effort has given to the American people upon this subject. It is fortunate for some men that they write; it is very unfortunate for others that they write and publish their writings; and I now can understand, if I never did before, the force of the sentiment long since expressed by an eminent individual, "Oh, that mine adversary had written a book!" My friend from New York has written, if not a book, at least a good many pieces in newspapers, and if they were put together and bound they would make a book. But whether a book or not, they are equally binding, and of equal force on this occasion.

Slavery—that thing that was "dead," and which the gentleman from New York now seeks to resurrect—is not the blessed boon to the human family that he and others would have us believe at this day, if he is to be believed in his declarations made a few years since upon this same question. I read from his own language.

"Washington, March 8, 1833," is the date. This is December 14, 1864. Strange that a little less than thirty-one years should change so greatly a man's sentiments, change his opinions, change his language, change his very being, if that were possible. Now, sir, let me tell that gentleman that, although I have never been across the Atlantic, although I claim not his knowledge of the languages or his polished, silver-tongued oratory, there is one truth that outweighs all these—that is, that principles are eternal. What was right in 1833 cannot be wrong to-day. What was right a thousand years ago must be right to-day, and will be if we live a billion of years in the future. Now, sir, what was right in 1833 in reference to that question, the gentleman himself being the judge in the case? He is posted upon this question. It is not a matter of yesterday with him. It is a question to which he has given the attention of his life and one upon which he is at this day eminently qualified to instruct the American people. He says:

"Slavery carries with it its own afflictions, its own punishments. It is a dead drag to the body-politic."

Ay, sir, and I think that some of the gentlemen's friends on the 8th of last November found it to be so much of a "dead drag" that the party who attempted to drag it found themselves dead.

"It is a dead drag to the body-politic. It is impossible for any community to prosper with it in its bosom."

So I think, so think the majority of the American people—that it is impossible for them to prosper with that "dead drag" hung upon their backs; and therefore they now feel disposed to get rid of it.

"The affliction bears as heavily upon the master as upon the slave."

Yea, verily, does it! It does bear heavily upon the master as well as upon the slave, and thousands and tens of thousands of the free and loyal men of this land have suffered not only in their rights but have gone down to their graves because slavery has existed in this country.

"It endangers the peace and happiness of the master."

Does the gentleman wish to endanger the peace and happiness of his friends in the South? If not, why does he come into this Congress and continue his present course of conduct?

"And robs the slave of his freedom and his birthright."

So we think.

"As to prosperity and the accumulation of property, it keeps the master in the rear of others in a like situation exempt from this evil, and thus depresses him when it depresses his servant. It is demonstrable, in my opinion, that that community of whites, taken as a whole, must be happier, more prosperous, and richer, where slavery is prohibited than where it is allowed."

Now I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that we are in favor of prohibiting slavery. Does he say that is wrong? He says that it produces unhappiness. It is his own language—not dictated to him by me; not dictated to him by any gentleman on this side of the House, or any gentleman upon this floor, for it was written at a time when no man who occupies a seat here now was a member of this House. It was his candid opinion on the question.

It may be replied that the effort to-day, and the efforts heretofore, have not been made with the intention of strengthening slavery. Then what have they been made for? Is it only an exhibition of oratory and eloquence? The gentleman has traveled over the continents of Europe and Asia and Africa, he has quoted the history of ancient and modern times, and, not content with profane history, he has given us ample quotations from the Scriptures. I am astonished, utterly astonished, and unable to account for it, that after quoting from the Old Testament and from the New Testament, yet in the same speech, before the words had scarcely passed from his lips, he tells you he does not bow the knee to his Saviour. Well, I say, God save me from the man who quotes Scripture and yet denies its force. It may be right for some men, but I am earnest and sincere when I make the prayer that I want to be saved from men of that kind. I want to be saved from them morally, religiously, and politically.

There may be sincerity there, but I lack the apprehension to see it.

But that is not all. There is a great deal which the time of the House will not justify me in reading. But I do not intend that his speech shall go to the world, ingenious as it is, without being contradicted. I do not want that it shall be contradicted by any gentleman in this House, and there are many more able to reply to it than I am. I am not satisfied with that kind of answer; for I tell you, Mr. Chairman, and I tell this House to-day, that when the Globe shall go to the world with the speech of the gentleman from New York, which is intended to undermine the fair fabric of our free institutions by embarrassing the Government, it shall carry the poison and the antidote in his own language. I want the gentleman from New York answered by the same gentleman from New York. I hope the reporters will take particular pains to report this part of my speech.

"Who does not see, then, that it is for the interest of the North to have the South a slaveholding people? Cupidity and meanness and avarice all point that way. Give the South, with the climate, the free labor of the North, and the North, with her rocks and her ice, must yield. The South must become more prosperous. The people must become richer. The country must become better populated; for it is a law of our nature that what we do for ourselves we do with a better heart than what we do for others. Northern people, then, have no interest in liberating the slaves of the South."

Is that the reason why the gentleman opposes the liberation of the slaves? I do not say that it is, but it is the fair inference from what he wrote in 1833.

Again he says:

"I do not agree with many whom I meet with here, and who say, judging from what they see, that the negroes are an inferior race of men, and therefore we have a right to make them subservient to us."

I call the attention of the House to that language. The gentleman believes the negroes are not an inferior race. If he does not believe them inferior he must believe they are at least equal to us.

"I deny the premises, or, granting them, deny the inference. I can find negroes, very many, even here, who are active and bright, and who, if educated, would make a figure in the world;"

Ay, "make a figure in the world." And are the chains to be riveted and the shackles fastened upon those men who, if free and possessed of the advantages of education would make a figure in the world?

"who are better gifted, and better instructed also, than some of the whites on the sand hills or the pine barrens."

Why, it seems to me that the vision of some departed old abolitionist appeared to the gentleman from New York when he wrote these lines. It would seem as if he had imbibed the spirit of Phillips, or some other abolitionist, when he penned these lines to a friend in New York:

"But the great mass of the whole black race are deplorably ignorant, deplorably incapable. Some of the freed negroes are the most stupid animated matter I ever met with. The well-trained dog has more intelligence than they have. Others about house, who come in daily contact with their masters and their families, are bright, more or less, comparatively speaking; thus showing that it is ignorance, want of education or association with educated men that brutifies them; and I have observed very often that where there is the greatest mass of ignorance there is the most brutified race. Southern gentlemen sometimes inquire if you would set such a mass of ignorance loose at once, and give it freedom. I have never made up any opinion upon this question, or any other, than this, that it is none of my business, but theirs;"

Now the gentleman thinks it is his business; that is, his business to keep them in slavery, but not to set them free—

"and that I would not live in a country where such a state of things existed, and where there was so much danger."

And while he would not live in a country in which slavery existed, yet he has quoted from the Old Testament and the New Testament to uphold it; and though I have in the last thirty years often heard Paul's speech on Mars' hill preached from, I never before heard such a conclusion drawn from it as has been drawn from it by the gentleman from New York to-day.

"Southern gentlemen in general affect to despise the danger. But if they do, their wives and daughters do not. Indeed they do not. They dare not speak freely on this subject at a dinner table, when a slave is within hearing. Such conversation is obscure, or in whispers. So far they are slaves themselves, that in the presence of their slaves they must keep a guard on their conversation. They do not go to bed at night with the same ease and freedom we do. They call their military to their aid, and keep their slaves under martial law. The cities of Richmond, Charleston, and Savannah keep up a military guard. No small portion of the white population must watch under arms while the other portion sleeps."

And this was in 1833, when enjoying all the blessings of slavery, and when they had the control of the entire Government.

"Tell me there is no belief of danger when the military watches over one's body and one's property."

That is a part of the gentleman's language upon the subject of slavery, and yet, in the last session of Congress, speech after speech made by that gentleman, and characterized by his usual ability and eloquence, was telegraphed over the wires to the southern confederacy. And the wires will transmit this speech, but at the same time it will carry the news that but a small portion of the House concurs in his opinion. We are treated here to-day with the hackneyed phrase that we cannot conquer the rebels, that we cannot subdue eight millions; and the gentleman quotes from Roman history. I must say that either Gibbon or he must be mistaken in regard to some of the numbers and figures. I presume Gibbon is in error.

Do we here want to know that we cannot conquer the South? Is that declaration made to strengthen our arms and encourage our hearts? No, sir; I charge it upon the gentleman, and all others who dare make that assertion, that it is intended to encourage those who are in arms against the Government; who are endeavoring to tear down the best Government ever given to mankind. Outside of this Hall I never heard—

Mr. McKINNEY. I rise to a point of order. It is that the gentleman charges the gentleman from New York with intending to strengthen the rebels in arms. It is not in order to make such a charge.

Mr. PRICE. That I believe he intended it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair.) The point of order is well taken, in the judgment of the Chair. It is not in order for one gentleman to characterize the remarks of another gentleman in that way.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McKINNEY. I insist that the gentleman shall not go on until the House gives its consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the gentleman have leave to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I believe this is the first time in my life—and I am fifty years old—that I was ever called to order.

Mr. McKINNEY. The gentleman has been left to run free too long.

Mr. PRICE. I will say, for the information of members of the House who are not acquainted with me, that it is not my intention to be out of order, and I say, also, positively and emphatically, that it is my intention not to shirk the truth, and if I cannot talk the truth here, I will not talk at all; but I shall speak inside the line of order if I know how.

I was saying—and this must be in order—that outside of this Hall I never heard—

Mr. CHANLER. I want to ask the gentleman a question in this connection.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield.

Mr. CHANLER, (amid cries of "Order!") Did the gentleman vote for the expulsion of Mr. LONG, of Ohio?

Mr. PRICE. Oh, yes. I will answer that question, certainly. I did vote for the resolution of expulsion, and I am only sorry that it did not succeed.

I was proceeding to say—and hope this will be in order—that outside of this Hall I have never heard language that I would call rubbing up along so close to treasonable language as I have heard here. It is rather a difficult matter for a man who wants to say just what he thinks, and is afraid of getting over the line of order, to so fashion his words and trim his sails as to keep within the channel. I shall try, however, to do it, and will say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that I have not risen for the purpose of making a speech. I had not any intention of saying a word upon this subject, but I thought I would let the language of the gentleman from New York spoken in 1833 go on the record with the language he has used to-day on this subject. Three fourths of the speech of the gentleman had reference to Russia, and France, and England, and Austria, and parts of Asia.

A MEMBER. And Rome.

Mr. PRICE. Yes, and Rome. I would not forget Rome for a great deal, because there is the point where the gentleman from New York and Gibbon disagree. But I do not intend to reply to any of these things; my sole purpose was to place the language used by the gentleman to-day in juxtaposition with language used by the same gentleman on the same subject on a former occasion. And then I was proceeding to talk about what I had heard again, and again, and again, and had supposed to be disposed of and laid away on the shelf only to be resurrected some generations hence, about our inability to conquer the rebels, that we must exterminate them, and that the history of the world proves in the first place that we cannot exterminate them, and in the next place that we cannot subdue them without extermination, and then of course we shall have to give it up. That is as much as to say to the people of Richmond and to Jeff. Davis that here, in the high council chamber of the nation where the Representatives of the whole people are assembled, a gentleman who is one of the best orators on the floor, if not the best, stands up and tells this House and the country that Jeff. Davis and his friends cannot be subdued. When you can make our people believe that, why, as a matter of course, we shall have to give the rebels their own terms.

And this brings me to another part of the gentleman's speech. He says that when all proffers of peace—mark the words, gentlemen, for they seem to cover an immense amount, all proper proffers and all improper ones—when all proffers of peace shall have been extended to the rebels and rejected by them, then he will—well, he will do something, he does not say what. My colleague from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] asks him again and again would he in that case be in favor of putting down this armed rebellion by force of arms, and he dodges the question. Is that in order? He dodges it; he has not answered the question. When "all proffers" are made! What are we to understand by that? Are we to go to the South with hat in hand and say "You have been our masters, lo! these many years, and this is the first time in the history of the Government when you have tried to coerce us and we did not yield; you are now trying to break up the Government; we ask you now to resume your mastery on your own terms; 'what will you have us do?'" Is that what we are to do? There never was a time in the history of the Government when the slave States demanded anything of the free States that was not yielded until 1861 when they saw proper to fire upon the old flag of the Union, the ensign of our nationality, and when that infamous scoundrel Pickens—is that in order?—boasted that South Carolina was the first State in the Union that had trailed the stars and stripes in the dust. Who would be the apologist or advocate of men like that? The man who would do it I think would be aiding and abetting treason. I presume that is in order.

I have heard the gentleman from New York, not only to-day, but in the last session of this Congress in his place here, talk about the statesmen of England, and the enviable position that they occupied toward the colonies, and say that they had built themselves a monument of fame undying. Does he wish us to understand—I would like to have an answer to that question—that he occupies the same position toward the southern confederacy, so called, that the English statesmen that he has quoted occupied toward the colonies? Is he the advocate and apologist for the southern confederacy? If not, I fail to see the force of his argument. And then, as was justly remarked by another of my colleagues, [Mr. KASSON] does he wish to draw a parallel between this infamous and uncalled-for rebellion and the Revolution of 1776? Why, every school-boy ten years old knows that there is no parallel at all. There are contrasts, wide, marked, and unmistakable, but no parallel. They made our laws for us in England, and sent over our officers. We had no voice in the matter, and when the burden became too oppressive and intolerable longer to be borne, then, as freemen exercising the right of freemen, we contended for an adjustment of those rights, and a return of what was justly due us. These men of the South, whom my friend from New York compares with the men of the Revolution, have made the laws of this country for the last fifty or seventy-five years. For three fourths of that time they have held the offices, both judicial and executive. They made the laws, and when it did not suit them any longer to abide by those laws and by the Constitution given to us by our fathers they revolted, they rebelled, and they took up arms against the Government. Where is the parallel between them and the men of the Revolution? There is a contrast wide as the gulf between heaven and hell; but there is no parallel at all.

Mr. Chairman, I have said more than I intended to say on this matter. It does appear to me that very little need be said upon it. There is but one thing to be said of the true men of the nation, I care not by what name they may be called. They are the men who stand up for the flag of their country, and against oppression. They are the men who, coming from all denominations of Christians and all parties, rally around the flag of the Union, and who are determined to carry forward this war to a successful termination, whatever it may cost, even though the institution of slavery shall go down with it.

On the other side are the apologists of slavery. They are the men who claim to be Union men, but who, in all their speeches, all their actions, and all their efforts, are forever finding fault with what is done on the side of the Union, and by Union men, while they have never a word against treason, or traitors, or against Jeff. Davis's government. I think it is time that the people of the United States, and particularly the men sent to Congress to represent their constituents, throughout the length and breadth of the land, should take this matter in a different light. I think it is time that they should rally together as one man, and that when speeches are to be made on this floor, whether in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or in the House, men shall talk loyally, so that they shall be above suspicion; that the words they have to say, if of cheer, shall be for their own Government; and that their words of condemnation shall not be for this Government, but for the enemies of the country who are in arms against that Government. When that shall come about, and when the South shall be satisfied that we stand as a unit, shoulder to shoulder, hand to hand, eye to eye, in this matter; when they see that we are determined that they shall go down to the shades of oblivion, or shall obey the laws of the land; when, I say, they are satisfied of that, there will be no longer any rebellion in the South. But just as long as they are satisfied that they have friends at the North, and in the national Capitol, just as long as speeches are made here which can be easily interpreted to mean that the South is not wrong in its course of action, just so long may the rebels be expected to have heart and hope for the infamous and traitorous war they are waging.

I have a hope, therefore—nay, it is only a half hope—that hereafter the speeches to be made on this floor by members on the other side of the House will have a little more of the ring of the true metal of patriotism unalloyed; that they will contain words of cheer for their country and for the brave men who are carrying the flag of freedom in the forefront of advancing columns, charging on the enemy in the battle-field; and that they will contain no words of cheer for those who are endeavoring to destroy our civil and religious institutions.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the last annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

POST OFFICE FINES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with an act of Congress approved July 2, 1836, a report of all fines imposed and deductions from the pay of contractors for carrying the mails during the preceding year; which was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. By a law passed at the last session this report is not to be printed except by special order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 15, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

Hon. WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON, of Illinois, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLEY presented the memorial of the Franklin Insurance Company of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying for an extension and amendment of its charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Charles K. Graham, a brigadier general in the army of the James, and other officers, praying for an increase of the pay proper, of the allowance for servants, and of the price of the ration allowed to officers of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of members of the Cigar Makers' Union of Philadelphia, praying for a repeal of the law taxing cigars, and that the duties imposed thereon may be placed upon the raw material; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FOOT presented the petition of James B. Royce, praying to be allowed the bounty of $100 provided by law in cases of discharge for disability occasioned by wounds received in battle; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NAVAL FORCE ON THE LAKES.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate any information on the files of the Department of State concerning the paper published in the volume of Treaties and entitled "Arrangement between the United States and Great Britain, between Richard Rush, Esq., acting as Secretary of State, and Charles Bagot, her Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary," relating to the naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes.

DISLOYAL GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire as to the truth of the alleged charge that large numbers of disloyal persons are in the employ of the Government in the various navy-yards and quartermasters' and ordnance depots throughout the country, to the exclusion of loyal men, with power on the part of said committee to send for persons and papers.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to repeat a statement that was made in my presence last night to a large assembly of gentlemen in a public speech, that a few days ago the son of a soldier who had perished in a rebel prison applied at the navy-yard in Philadelphia for employment, that employment being necessary for the maintenance of the family left by this soldier who had died of starvation; that he was refused, while at the moment of his refusal there were thousands of disloyal men in the employment of that navy-yard. I make this statement in the hearing of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and call his attention to it. I ask for the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that perhaps he had better take a special committee. This resolution will open a very broad field of inquiry, and probably a broader field than the committee on the conduct of the war can occupy during the present session. If the Senator will ask for a special committee to make this investigation, I shall certainly vote for his resolution. The committee on the conduct of the war is already instructed to investigate many very important matters, and probably will not have time during the remainder of this short session to take up this great subject. It is at the present moment under orders from the two Houses of Congress to investigate perhaps as much as it can possibly accomplish between now and the 4th day of March.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. My object in offering the resolution is to have this investigation and a report made on the subject before the installation of the new Administration. If there is such an evil as that referred to in the resolution, it ought to be known and the policy of the Administration to be changed, on its installation at least. I am one of the men who believe that no Government can be successfully administered unless it surrounds itself by officeholders in sympathy with it, and I want this report made before the 4th day of March next, if it can be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any peculiar confidence in the Administration, or any greater confidence than is possessed by any member of the Senate; but notwithstanding that, I am perfectly willing to trust the executive administration of the Government to the President of the United States. If that is not done in the instance referred to by the honorable member from Kansas, it must be because he is not advised of it, and the offering of the resolution itself will bring the fact to his attention, and will cause him, as I am sure he is himself loyal, to see that every department of the Government under his charge is properly and loyally administered. What may be the fact in relation to this particular navy-yard I am not advised of, nor did I ever hear it questioned until this moment by the honorable Senator from Kansas; but I certainly understood, a day or two after the last election, that every employé of that navy-yard voted for the reelection of the present incumbent of the presidential chair. That, I suppose, is some evidence of loyalty, as the converse of the proposition is, with some, supposed to be true, that those who did not so vote are to be considered as disloyal.

What I object to is, that we should, as a Senate, interfere with what I think is a peculiar duty of the executive department. Suppose the investigation turns out as the honorable member supposes it may be, and we express an opinion. That has no legal binding bearing upon the President of the United States. He may or may not disregard it, either because he thinks it immaterial or because he does not concur in the conclusion to which your committee may come; and if, upon either ground, he refuses, what are you to do? Are you to go to the other House and suggest that he be impeached, when, by doing so, you, in advance, pronounce a judgment against him upon that subsequent possible impeachment?

The Government, according to my understanding of the relations in which the departments stand to each other, cannot get on unless each is left to the full and fair and unimpeded discharge of its separate official duties. And while I know that the Senate of the United States, now and ever, when the honor of the country has been at stake, has never failed in loyalty or in patriotism, and is especially patriotic at the present time, I am willing to believe, and I do believe, that in that particular they are not at all superior to the Executive of the United States. He is equally loyal and equally patriotic. Whatever differences of opinion I might entertain in relation to him and his policy, are differences wholly irrespective of the question whether he is loyal or not loyal. I never doubted it from the beginning of his administration; I do not doubt it now; and I have no reason to suppose that I shall be brought to doubt it hereafter. But what I protest is, that we should, not at his instance, but apparently as against his conduct, constitute a committee for the purpose of getting the material by which we are to control his administration in the future.

The honorable member talks of inaugurating a new Administration on the 4th of March. Who is to inaugurate it? What authority have we over the manner in which that Administration shall conduct the affairs of the nation except what the Constitution gives? Try him if he comes before us properly under the provisions of the Constitution, by an impeachment presented by the House of Representatives; try him only; not in advance pronounce a judgment, holding him up before the people of the United States as having been already recreant to his duty.

Mr. President, the condition of the country now requires forbearance upon the part of every member who is here in the council of the Government—forbearance and confidence. The dreadful civil strife in which we have been engaged now for nearly four years is going on, when to terminate God only knows. That it will terminate at some future day, and terminate so as to bring about a restored Union and a peace such as will be permanent, I have no doubt now, as I never have had a doubt, provided the councils of the country, legislative and executive, are true to their own constitutional duty; and I am far from suspecting that the President of the United States will in either particular which falls within the hypothetical condemnation of this resolution fail to be true to his duty.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, I have adopted this plan for the purpose of bringing the information to the attention of the President, believing that he will remedy it when it is shown him. There is no better way to furnish it to him than through a committee of this body.

Forbearance, the honorable Senator from Maryland suggests! Forbearance to employ disloyal men in our navy-yards to the exclusion of loyal men! Forbearance ceases to be a virtue when carried thus far. In my opinion, sir, Congress itself is not without a remedy. I am one of the men who believe that a navy-yard that cannot be run without the employment of disloyal men should be abated. I am one of the men who believe that any position that has to be filled by a disloyal man should be abolished. Having entire confidence in the loyalty of the President, it is with no other view than to bring this existing evil to his attention in a tangible form that I have introduced the resolution, and I trust it will be adopted.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 350) to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill of the Senate with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 329) for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; and

A bill (No. 586) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 123) to correct certain clerical errors in the Internal Revenue act, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

RAIDS FROM THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire now to call up the resolutions I offered yesterday in order to move their reference to a committee. If Senators will permit the reference to be made unanimously, without debate, I am perfectly willing to wave debate, but if it is desired to enter on a discussion of the subject now, I am prepared to do that. I will first move to take up the one in relation to the Canada frontiers.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Whereas raids have been organized in the Canadas and Nova Scotia, and men enlisted in said British provinces by men purporting to hold commissions from the rebels of the United States, for the purpose of robbing and murdering peaceable citizens of the United States, of burning cities and villages, of practically capturing merchant vessels and murdering their crews, and for a general system of murder, arson, robberies, and plunder of the peaceable and unarmed citizens of the United States; and whereas the people of the British provinces seem disposed to protect these thieves, robbers, incendiaries, pirates, and murderers, not only in their individual capacities, but by the quibbles of the law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of immediately enlisting an Army corps to watch and defend our territory bordering on the lakes and Canadian line from all hostile demonstrations and incursions.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to suggest to my friend that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator so modify his motion?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. If it is allowed to go in that direction I shall have nothing to say; otherwise I might have something to say upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

RECLAMATION ON GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up the other resolution that I offered yesterday.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Whereas at the commencement of the present rebellion the United States were at peace with all the Governments of the world, and upon terms of comity and good-will with Great Britain; and whereas that nation, before the arrival on her soil of our minister accredited by the administration of President Lincoln, precipitately acknowledged the rebels as belligerents, thus recognizing their flag upon the ocean, without which recognition it would have been regarded and treated as piratical by all other Powers; and whereas she then proclaimed perfect neutrality between a Republic with which she had entertained friendly relations for upward of a half century and its unreasonable subjects; and whereas numbers of her subjects, with the knowledge of her Government, commenced fitting out British fast-sailing ships, loaded with munitions of war, for the purpose of running into our blockaded ports to the rebels, thus furnishing them the means of organizing and continuing the rebellion, and without which it could not have sustained itself six months; and whereas, in addition to the above, and with the knowledge of the Government, British subjects and members of Parliament engaged in the manufacture of piratical English ships, owned by British subjects, manned by British seamen, and sailing under British colors, for the purpose of burning, destroying, and utterly driving from the ocean all peaceful merchant vessels sailing under the United States flag; and whereas many private and unarmed American ships have been burned and destroyed by these pirates from British ports, thus causing great loss and damage to the citizens of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed immediately to make out a list of each ship and cargo thus destroyed, with a fair and separate valuation thereof, and interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the date of capture or destruction to the date of presentation, and that he be directed to demand from the British Government payment in full for all ships and cargoes destroyed as aforesaid.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that this resolution take the same direction as the other.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ENROLLMENT OF MILITIA.

Mr. BROWN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of Congress of March 8, 1792, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," and also the several acts amendatory of the same, as shall provide for the enrollment of all male citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, resident in the respective States, without respect to color; and also to submit such other provisions as may tend more efficiently to organize the militia system of the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

As this is simply a resolution of instruction to the committee to inquire into the expediency of passing a law on this subject, I will ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ALEXANDER J. ATOTCHA.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 281.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atotcha was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Court of Claims to examine into the claims of Alexander J. Atotcha against the Government of Mexico for losses sustained by him by reason of his expulsion from that republic in 1845, and to fix and determine their amount; and when the loss or damage so sustained is adjudicated and determined by the court, it is to be paid to him, provided the amount so to be paid shall in no event exceed the balance of the $3,250,000 provided by the fifteenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico which still remains unapplied to that object.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill does not propose to appropriate any money. It proposes to authorize the petitioner to have his claim heard and adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and if they should find any amount due, that amount is to be paid if it shall not exceed the sum already provided in the fifteenth article of the treaty referred to in the bill set apart for the payment of this class of claims. The Committee on Foreign Relations, without undertaking to determine whether any amount was due to the petitioner or not, were satisfied, and I believe unanimously satisfied, that there was at least merit enough in the claim to have it heard before the proper court. I hope, therefore, the bill will be allowed to pass.

Mr. COLLAMER. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo with Mexico, the United States undertook to pay the claims which existed in favor of our citizens against Mexico, provided they did not exceed the sum of $3,000,000—I think that was the sum. Whatever there is of that sum remaining in the Treasury of the United States is the property of the United States, unless it becomes necessary to pay just claims due our citizens from Mexico. This bill contains an appropriation to be paid out of that money. The justice of it all depends upon whether this is a just claim. The commissioners created by the treaty for the purpose of settling, auditing, and allowing these claims, have long since performed that duty, and all claims that they found to be just have been paid. I do not know whether this claim was ever adjudicated upon by them or not; but if it was, it was rejected, as it has not been paid. I do not know what reason is given why the claim was not presented and adjudicated and settled there.

But, sir, I desire more particularly to call attention to the expression made use of in this bill:

"That the Court of Claims be and the said court is hereby directed to examine into the claims of Alexander J. Atotcha against the Government of Mexico for losses sustained by him by reason of his expulsion from that republic in 1845, and to fix and determine the amount of the same; and that the loss or damage so sustained, being adjudicated and determined by said court, the same shall be paid," &c.

That, as I understand the words, does not ask of the court to inquire into the merits of the claim. It directs the court to ascertain the amount which the man suffered by being sent out of Mexico, without saying whether his being sent out was right or wrong. That has been the great issue in the case of Atotcha. It was always insisted by Mexico that this was no just claim against her; that she had a right to remove him in the relation in which he stood and the manner in which he conducted himself; that she did remove him, and had the right to remove him, and that there was no just claim about it at all. Now it is proposed to take up this claim which the commissioners of Mexico when they were sitting with ours disallowed, disclaimed, and never agreed to, and, as I understand the bill, to direct the Court of Claims to ascertain how much that man suffered by being sent out of the then republic of Mexico at a certain time, and then, the amount being so adjudicated, it is to be paid, when the merits of it, or whether he was properly or improperly sent out of Mexico, is not by the bill submitted to the court at all. So far as my recollection of it goes, the very essence of the case is not so much in regard to the amount, as the merits of the claim upon Mexico as falling within the terms of our treaty. I am not prepared at this moment to submit an amendment to the bill, but if we submit the question at all to the Court of Claims, I desire that some phraseology may be used by which we shall submit it upon the merit that belongs to it, and not merely the amount which they might find resulting from his being sent from that country.

Mr. FOSTER. The object of the committee was directly to arrive at the result suggested by the Senator from Vermont, and to have the court instructed to inquire into this case—not merely into the amount of damage or loss sustained by Mr. Atotcha, but into the question of the merits of his claim, and unless he were unjustly treated by the Government of Mexico, he would have no claim upon that Government. We certainly were not of the opinion that he should be paid any loss that he might have justly suffered. If the bill is not so framed, it is my wish, and I am sure the wish of the committee, as it would be of the Senate, that it should be; and, under the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, I am perfectly willing that the bill should be laid aside until he may propose any amendment that will meet his views. Certainly, any amendment that embodies that principle only, is as much in accordance with the views of the committee as it can be with his. I am willing, therefore, and move, that it be laid on the table for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. FOSTER subsequently said: I move now that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of A. J. Atocha, which was laid aside a few moments since at the instance of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the bill by striking out in the seventh line the words "and to" before "fix," and inserting in lieu of them, "and if they shall be of opinion that the said claim was a just one against Mexico when the treaty of 1848 was ratified, and was embraced by said treaty, they shall then." This amendment has been shown to the Senator from Vermont and meets his approval. I hope, therefore, that it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. This case was familiar to me some years ago, but I have forgotten the details of it. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow; I desire time to reexamine it. It covers, if I remember rightly, several hundred thousand dollars. It is a long-contested, dubious old claim, which I should like to look into thoroughly before voting upon the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I have, of course, no objection to the motion of the Senator from Michigan if he wishes to examine the case. If, however, he is under the apprehension that the bill takes any money from the Treasury, I assure him that he is mistaken; it takes not a cent from the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does it from the fund provided for by the treaty?

Mr. FOSTER. Not a cent from the fund. It simply authorizes this individual to try his case in the Court of Claims; and if he has no case, I am sure that court will say he has none. It does not take a dollar from the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. The case was up once before, and I should like to examine it again thoroughly.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to a postponement if the Senator wishes to take time to examine the bill, but I thought he was under a mistake as to its effect.

Mr. CHANDLER. I may be; but I wish to look into it.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well; I have no objection to the postponement.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

GEORGE W. MURRAY.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 380. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 380) for the relief of George W. Murray. It directs the Commissioner of Pensions to pay to George W. Murray the pension to which he was entitled by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1837, entitled "An act for the more equitable administration of the Navy pension fund."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REUBEN CLOUGH.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 316) for the relief of Reuben Clough, which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Reuben Clough on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 15th of May, 1815, and ending on the 29th of December, 1848, when his present pension was allowed him at the Pension Bureau.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that there are several Senators who desire to be heard at length upon this bill, among others the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] As I desire to give every Senator a full opportunity to discuss this bill, I move that its further consideration be postponed, and that it be made the special order for Tuesday next, on which day the debate may go on.

Mr. GRIMES. Fix a day beyond the holidays; for until then the bill cannot be satisfactorily considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. If we find on Tuesday next that further postponement is desirable it can then be postponed to a subsequent day.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would suggest to the Senator from Michigan whether he had not better postpone it a few days later. The Senate may not be in session on Tuesday next.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the first Tuesday in January suit the Senator better?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; though any time will suit me.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, then, I will consent to that.

Mr. BROWN. Say the first Wednesday in January.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it would be better to say the first Wednesday or Thursday in January.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will so vary my motion as to designate the first Wednesday in January next.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed to and it was made the special order for Wednesday, the 4th day of January next, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto.

GUNBOAT FOR LIBERIA.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 356) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of Liberia.

The bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States to transfer to the Government of the republic of Liberia any one of the gunboats now or hereafter included in the Navy of the United States, her armament, tackle, apparel, and furniture, which may be acceptable to that Government, and can, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, be conveniently spared for that purpose, and upon a valuation to be fixed by him. The Secretary of the Navy is also to be directed to enter into a contract with any person duly empowered by the Government of that republic, by which that Government shall engage to repay to the United States the value of the gunboat to be transferred; and the contract is to stipulate for the full reimbursement to the United States of the value of such gunboat in annual installments, not exceeding ten in number, with interest on each at six per cent. per annum from the date of the contract.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. POWELL. I am under the impression that this bill ought not to pass. I do not think this Government, while engaged in this war, should send gunboats off to any foreign Power. I think it would be impolitic to do so. As I am opposed to it, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not enter into any debate on this question; I shall content myself with calling attention to the words of the President in his annual message. A very short paragraph on this subject there, it seems to me, is a complete answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky. It is as follows:

"Official correspondence has been freely opened with Liberia, and it gives us a pleasing view of social and political progress in that republic. It may be expected to derive new vigor from American influence, improved by the rapid disappearance of slavery in the United States.

"I solicit your authority to furnish to the republic a gunboat at moderate cost, to be reimbursed to the United States by installments. Such a vessel is needed for the safety of that State against the native African races; and in Liberian hands it would be more effective in arresting the African slave trade than a squadron in our own hands. The possession of the least organized naval force would stimulate a generous ambition in the republic, and the confidence which we should manifest by furnishing it would win forbearance and favor toward the colony from all civilized nations."

Mr. POWELL. The portion of the President's message which has been read by the Senator from Massachusetts has not caused me to change my opinion. I had before noticed that recommendation in the message, and I thought it most singular at the time the message was read at the desk. I do not think this Government ought to be taking charge of the interests of other countries; it certainly is as much as we can do to take care of our own. I think one of the evils of the time in this Confederacy has grown out of the fact that some of the States and the people of some of the States have been intermeddling with the institutions of other States and sections. I think it is wrong in every aspect of the case that we should take the guardianship of other countries or interfere with them. If they want gunboats, let them build them; if they want ships of the line, let them build them. They ought to know all about their own policies. If they have the money to pay for gunboats, they can have them built, or any other description of vessels of war. If they choose to come and hire our ship-builders to build them in their private docks, all very well; but for this Government to set about to regulate the policies of other people, and to turn trader in gunboats, I think is highly impolitic. It is a thing which the Senate ought not to concur in for a moment. It is not my purpose to make a speech on the subject; I merely wish to put on record my opposition to any such intermeddling policy.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 33, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Colman, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Harding, Hendricks, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, and Wright—9.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Hale, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Richardson, and Saulsbury—7.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. GRIMES rose when Mr. MORRILL's name was called and said: I desire to say that the Senator from Maine has been called home by a telegraphic dispatch announcing the extreme illness of a member of his family; that is the reason of his absence at this time.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate copies of the laws, memorials, and resolutions of the Territory of Dakota, passed at the third session of the Legislative Assembly; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. RIDDLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 357) for the relief of Olivia W. Cannon, widow of Joseph S. Cannon, late a midshipman in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the following joint resolution and bills were taken up and recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia:

A joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861;

A bill (S. No. 103) to define the pay and emoluments of chaplains in the United States Army and volunteer forces, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons, residents of certain States, into the regiments of other States;

A bill (S. No. 231) concerning the subsistence and pay of the Army; and

A bill (S. No. 284) to increase the efficiency of the staff of the Army.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the bill (S. No. 93) to repeal so much of the acts of Congress, approved March 3, 1845, and August 6, 1846, as authorize the transportation of goods imported from foreign countries through the United States to the Canadas, or from the Canadas through the United States to be exported to foreign countries, was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, and the bill (No. 586) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

WILLIAM H. JAMESON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 329) for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, which provides for the allowance to Paymaster Jameson, in the settlement of his accounts, of a credit of $959 14 for money in his hands on board the steamer Ruth, which was destroyed by fire on the night of August 4, 1863.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to add to the bill the following words:

If, on examination of the evidence by the Paymaster General, he, the said Paymaster General, shall deem him justly entitled to said credit; but such credit shall not be allowed without the said Paymaster General shall certify his approval thereof.

The amendment was concurred in.

ATTACK ON PETERSBURG.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the joint committee on the conduct of the war be directed to inquire into and report the facts concerning the attack on Petersburg on the 30th day of July, 1864.

FREEDOM OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States, with the view of leaving it as the unfinished business to come up on Monday morning, for I desire to get the vote of the Senate upon it at the earliest possible time. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 15, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting estimates of appropriations needed for the Department for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1865; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 329, for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bill No. 380, being an act for the relief of George W. Murray.

Also, that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which they asked the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 316) for the relief of Reuben Clough; and

An act (No. 356) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia.

ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution, which is merely one of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House copies of the order issued from his Department on the 21st day of December, 1863, in regard to recruits enlisted with conditions that they should be discharged when their regiments were mustered out of service; also copy of order or letter dated 22d day of December, 1863, and addressed to the Governor of the State of Massachusetts, in regard to recruits to fill up old regiments, and that he inform the House whether the principles announced in the order above mentioned have been applied to all soldiers mustered into the service to fill up those regiments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. My only object is to obtain information. When that shall be furnished the House, I shall have no objection to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to the inquiry being made. But the Committee on Military Affairs have this very morning been engaged in this investigation. We are gathering information from the War Department, and I think it better that the resolution be referred to our committee. If there be anything embraced in the resolution which has not been the subject of inquiry already, and upon which information has not been obtained through the committee, we will report it back and have that additional information called for by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that this is a subject in the disposition of which the whole country has some interest. I trust the gentleman will allow the information to be obtained, and have it referred to his committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. A portion of the information called for has already been obtained by the committee. We are now in consultation with the Secretary of War upon the subject, and a report is now in course of preparation. I know this is a subject which requires investigation, and we are now engaged in that investigation. I am perfectly willing to have this resolution referred to the committee; otherwise I must insist upon my objection to the passage of this resolution at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK subsequently said: I propose, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw my objection to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] with the understanding that he will simply introduce the order and the letter, copies of which he has, and have them referred to the committee. My only object is to have the Military Committee enabled to expedite the matter and make an early report upon the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all that I desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] withdraws his objection, and if there be no other objection, the resolution will be considered as introduced and agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the regular order of business.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion until I can submit a resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw it.

PREEMPTION AND HOMESTEAD LAWS.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill entitled "An act to prevent deserters and others, therein named, from acquiring public lands under the preemption and homestead laws;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ARREST OF LIEUT. GOVERNOR JACOB, ETC.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House all information in his possession bearing on the arrest and imprisonment of R. T. Jacob, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Kentucky, and Frank Wolford, one of the presidential electors of that State; and particularly by whose order they were arrested and imprisoned, where they are at present confined, and what offenses are charged against them.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolutions:

Whereas the increasing number of pensioners, and the increasing burdens necessarily falling upon the country for their support, render it advisable to devise some means whereby this class of persons may be provided with such life employments or opportunities for industrial enterprises as may induce them to make an effort at self-support independent of a Government pension: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to investigate all the facts and circumstances relating to the practical working of our pension laws, as a system of permanent relief to military or naval invalids; to inquire into the actual and present condition of such invalids, and to report what measures, relating to their future disposition, will best secure to such of them as are able to labor a life support independent of a Government pension.

Resolved, That this committee be authorized to take testimony, and for this purpose have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. STEVENS. I should have no objection to have those resolutions referred to the Committee on Pensions, but this raising committees with power to send for persons and papers upon subjects of this character seems to me to be a bad practice. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] to have these resolutions referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I observe that petitions, signed by several distinguished individuals, have been presented to the Senate asking for appropriations for this very purpose. My object is to have such investigation made, so that when action comes to be taken upon this subject it can be taken understandingly.

Mr. STEVENS. I have certainly no hostility to the object of the gentleman, but I would suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Pensions is the proper committee to consider this subject, and I hope the gentleman will so alter his resolution as to instruct that committee to investigate this subject.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I would prefer to have a special committee. It is simply for the purpose of obtaining information. I would suggest to the gentleman that there is no money involved in this matter.

Mr. STEVENS. I never knew a proposition to send for persons and papers that did not involve money.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Then I will waive that part, and will modify my resolutions by leaving out that one which authorizes the sending for persons and papers.

The resolution, as modified, was then agreed to.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT IN INDIANA.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 352, to authorize the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that a special session of the United States district court for the State of Indiana shall be held at the usual place of holding the court on the first Tuesday of January, 1865.

The second section provides that all suits and proceedings of a civil or criminal nature now pending in, or returnable to, the court, shall be proceeded in, heard, tried, and determined by the court at the special session in the same manner as at a regular term, and the judge is empowered to order the impaneling of a petit and grand jury for the session.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

DIFFICULTIES ON THE NORTHERN BORDER.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, if not incompatible with the public service, the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to this House all correspondence on file in his office with reference to the difficulties upon our northern border, and whose consideration has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the presentation of the resolution?

Mr. COX. I will state, in order to obviate any objection, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have charge of this subject, and this resolution is offered with the view of assisting them in the examination of the question.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the resolution will be considered as introduced and agreed to.

There was no objection.

TAXATION OF SAILING VESSELS.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of exempting sailing vessels of five hundred tons and upwards from the two per cent. tax imposed in the ninety-fourth section of the Internal revenue act of 1864.

TAX COMMISSIONERS FOR FLORIDA.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to this House a copy of the report of Hon. Austin Smith, appointed by the Treasury Department to investigate the conduct of the board of tax commissioners for the district of Florida, together with the evidence accompanying the same; and also to transmit copies of any communications made by the surators of any such tax commissioners, asking to be relieved from liability on the official bonds, said commission; and to inform the House what, if any, action has been taken on said report and communications, and the reasons therefor.

NAVY-YARD AT OSWEGO, NEW YORK.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the establishment of a navy-yard and depot at Oswego, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported to the Committee on Military Affairs a bill for the better organization of the subsistence department; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the bill be recommended, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN WINSLOW AND LIEUTENANT CUSHING.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Naval Affairs have instructed me to report a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, and also a joint resolution tendering similar thanks to Lieutenant William B. Cushing. It was my intention to report those resolutions whenever the Committee on Naval Affairs should be called upon for reports. In the mean time, however, the Senate has passed joint resolutions of the same nature, and those resolutions are now on the Speaker's table. I move that they be taken up and considered at this time.

The motion was agreed to; and the House proceeded to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 83, tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in her conflict with the piratical craft, the Alabama, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DESTRUCTION OF THE ALBEMARLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate joint resolution No. 84, tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, of the United States Navy, and the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albemarle, in compliance with the President's recommendation of December 5, 1864; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law; and the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition while pending and undetermined is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 63, not voting 50; as follows:

So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. RICE, of Maine, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to record his vote.

Mr. LE BLOND objected.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVILEGED QUESTION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I desire to be relieved by the House of Representatives from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I am willing, sir, to take all of the responsibilities that are connected with any service upon which the House of Representatives shall place me; but when in the course of the discharge of those duties I find myself unfortunately differing in opinion from the majority of the House, I do not consider it proper I should longer continue to hold any such position. The vote which has been just passed by the House is one which will allow of no other construction.

The House, on my motion, on the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, at the last session, passed a resolution declaring the policy of this Government touching the republics of America. It was adopted unanimously. It went to the Senate, and there it lies. It had not been passed three days before the officer charged with the foreign correspondence of this Government directed our representatives abroad virtually to apologize to the French Government for the resolution adopted by the Representatives of the people, and in that correspondence presumed to impeach Congress of usurpation in undertaking to prescribe to the President the rules which should guide him in the foreign policy of the United States.

That correspondence was made the subject of a circular by the French Government to all of the Governments of the world, to let them understand that the Congress of the United States had no right to speak with authority in the foreign affairs of the Government, and that nothing was to be regarded except the will and declarations of the Executive. In the debates that took place in the French Assembly the world was given to understand, by the member representing the emperor, that the passage of the resolution touching Mexican affairs and French intrusion into Mexico was a momentary outburst of passion on the part of the Representatives of the American people like that which occurred when Messrs. Mason and Sidel were arrested on board the Trent, but which did not prevent the Federal Government from giving up the two prisoners. The world was given to understand, on the authority of the Secretary of State, by the imperial Government, that Congress is such a thing as the French Assembly, the docile reflex of the executive will, its resolution a vain and presumptuous usurpation. The letter of the Secretary of State was in a tone that was not respectful to the dignity and the authority of the House of Representatives. And if that letter lays down the law of the land—and this House by its vote to-day says it does—then you have no right to a Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I am no child to play at doing that which you have no right to do. The Secretary of State, before all Europe, in a matter of the greatest moment, slapped the House of Representatives in the face in his correspondence with the French Government, and the House of Representatives says it will not even assert its dignity. The House of Representatives is the appropriate and adequate guardian of its own dignity. Sir, I am the only guardian of my own dignity; and after this vote and that correspondence I most humbly but respectfully ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COX. I feel constrained to object to relieving my colleague from service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but if the House insist upon excusing him, I ask the same privilege myself, and desire to be excused from service upon that committee. I have no doubt gentlemen will accord that privilege to me very readily, and perhaps excuse me from all committees, if that is their pleasure. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have had little to do since this Congress began. The House sent them this resolution for their consideration. The gentleman from Maryland examined the question committed to the committee with great care, great deliberation, and great learning, as his report, which has been sent to this House, will show. That report will challenge the admiration of everybody except those who are not perhaps diligent enough to read the proceedings of Congress, or too ignorant to understand the diplomatic history of the country.

Mr. Speaker, by an examination of that report, which has nothing of a partisan character in it, everybody would be satisfied that Congress has some voice, at least, in the foreign affairs of this country, and in the diplomatic arrangements by which our peace is kept with all the world. Precedent after precedent is cited where Congress has again and again recognized foreign Governments, and we all know the precedents with respect to voting appropriations to carry out treaties, in which the voice of Congress has been omnipotent with respect to our foreign relations. And there is no reason why the voice of the chairman of our committee, or the voice of that committee itself, should not have been treated respectfully in this House. The House passed a resolution vindicat-

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 4.

ing our continental policy and the Monroe doctrine from the infringement of foreign Powers, and especially France. It went to the Senate; there, for certain reasons, it sleeps—sleeps the sleep of death, and will know no waking. The country was insulted, the continent was insulted, by this French intervention, and the House of Representatives, in a moment of pride of nationality, of true dignity, asserted its proper prerogative with respect to this question. The Committee on Foreign Affairs but carried out their wishes. How our resolution was treated by the Executive and by the House in their action this day we know. But, sir, I do not think this action of the House a good reason why the gentleman from Maryland should be excused, or that the House should excuse him, unless he holds this House and this Congress in utter and absolute contempt. I hope, Mr. Speaker, there will be something done to vindicate the privileges of at least the lower House of Congress from the executive, and, if you please, diplomatic aggrandizement. We have had in this country within the last two years the same old question which they have had in England for a great many years and centuries—the old contest between the royal prerogative and parliamentary privilege, with this exception, whereas in England Parliament is paramount, in this country we are, or ought to be, limited by a written constitution. In England and in this country that contest has been waged between executive usurpation and congressional privilege; and the gentleman from Maryland, not only in this matter but in other matters, has asserted the congressional right against executive usurpation, and he deserves the thanks of every national man of every party for it.

It is time, sir, that the rights and privileges of the national Legislature were respected, and I would appeal to the self-respect of members upon both sides to vindicate their own dignity and the dignity of the Constitution. There is no question in my mind but that Congress has, if not a controlling, a large voice in diplomatic and foreign relations. But it seems, by the vote just taken on laying this resolution on the table, that the House thinks otherwise. If it chooses to think so, very well, but do not let the gentleman from Maryland, after such action, take umbrage at anything this House may do. He can vindicate his own self-respect and dignity, as he has done before, when our rights were intruded upon by the Executive in his famous manifesto, which he is bold enough at all times to vindicate before the people.

Mr. Speaker, there are a good many questions pertaining to congressional privileges which will arise before this session is over. They will require us to vindicate our rights here against the Executive. It was only yesterday that the House adopted the resolution of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] committing to the Committee on Foreign Affairs an inquiry as to what is necessary to be done to protect our northern boundary from the arson, robbery, and raids of the sneaking scoundrels upon our borders. Why was that resolution sent to us? Why should Congress take any action on the subject if we are to have no voice and no control in these foreign matters? Suppose we should make a report sustaining the action of General Dix, and the true interpretation of international law—is such a report to be null and void because this House has no control over the subject referred? Suppose we demand that Federal force should follow these rascally raiders across the border into the continuous jurisdiction of England, where they have been sheltered—are we to be told we have no business to meddle with it, as it is “purely an executive question?” The true doctrine, as it is laid down by Vattel, Phillimore, Wheaton, and by all international writers, and assented to by Webster in the Caroline case, would give this Government the right, for self-protection, of pursuit across the border, in precisely a case of this kind, where, in civil war, rebels are harbored on one side and make incursions upon the other; and if we report such a resolution asserting this right, are we then to be told it is not within the purview of our powers? Yet this matter has been referred to us, and if we make a report upon it, is that report to have any emphasis? Has Congress any right or control over the matter? If not, why did the House refer this matter to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? Why pass on such matters at all, and then table a resolution which only vindicates our rights and privileges?

I have no doubt that the House would willingly excuse me from serving on that committee. If they excuse the gentleman from Maryland, of course they will excuse the lesser and insignificant member of the committee; but I hope that they will not pass a vote of censure upon the committee by excusing him. If they do, this House sinks to the lowest level of any national Legislature that ever assembled here or in any other country. They deserve only to be on their knees perpetually in the dust at the footstool of power, and to be kicked and thrust aside by the Executive whenever he chooses to exercise any of its functions, diplomatic or otherwise. Let us vindicate our own rights. If we have the right to pass upon these matters let us exercise that right. If we have not, let us stop this mockery of sending to the Committee on Foreign Affairs these and kindred resolutions pertaining to Canada such as you sent to us yesterday. I shall, therefore, in courtesy to the honorable chairman of the committee to which I belong, vote against excusing him. I can testify to his ability, to his earnestness, to his energy, and to his outspoken integrity, and, so far as these foreign questions are concerned, to his nationality; and, Mr. Speaker, we need such a man, and may need him more hereafter upon that committee.

Mr. BLAINE. A single word, Mr. Speaker, on the other side. Parallels in history are always interesting, and often instructive. A recent correspondence on a threatened difficulty with France has brought this question before the House. Three quarters of a century ago we had troubles with the same nation, and those troubles were attended with an incident which, if not precisely parallel, at least involves the same general principle now under discussion. It is an incident connected with a name whose mention commands respect everywhere, and which I have peculiar confidence in presenting to the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. The very same objections and the very same appeals to the power of Congress were made in the French difficulties during the Administration of Washington, in the discussion between the French minister, Citizen Genet, and the American Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson; and it is to Mr. Jefferson's declarations that I especially invite attention. I beg the privilege of reading from Randolph's Life of Jefferson, volume two, pages 158 and 159, as follows:

“Genet took up the subject instantly in a very high tone, and for a time proceeded with such volubility that Jefferson found all efforts to take some part in the conversation were quite ineffectual.” The latter thus subsequently reported the substance of the conversation to the President:

“He charged us with having violated the treaties between the two nations, and so went into the cases which had before been subjects of discussion; complained that we suffered our flag to be insulted and disregarded by the English; that they stopped all our vessels, and took out of them whatever they suspected to be French property; that they had taken all the provisions he had embarked in American vessels for the colonies; that if we were not able to protect their vessels in our ports, nor their property on the high seas, we ought to permit them to protect themselves; and they, on the contrary, paid the highest respect to our flag; that, though it was notorious that most of the cargoes sent from America were British property, yet, being in American vessels, or pretended American vessels, they never touched it, and thus had no chance of retaliating on their enemies; that he had been thwarted and opposed in everything he had to do with the Government; that he found himself in so disagreeable a situation that he sometimes thought of packing up and going away, as he found that he could not be useful to his nation in anything.”

“After expatiating on the friendly propositions he had brought from his nation, and affirming that such a return to them ought not to have been made by the Executive without consulting Congress, he declared that on the President's return he would certainly press him to convene Congress. Having got into a more moderate tone, Jefferson now stopped him at the mention of Congress, explained to him the functions of the several departments of the Government, and that all the questions which had arisen between him and it belonged to the executive department, and if Congress had been sitting could not have been carried to them, nor would they have taken notice of them. Jefferson's further report of the conversation solicits a smile: “He [Genet] asked if they [Congress] were not the sovereign. I told him no; they were sovereign in making laws only; the Executive was sovereign in executing them; and the judiciary in construing them, where they related to their department.” “But,” said he, “at least Congress are bound to see that the treaties are observed.” I told him no; there were very few cases indeed, arising out of treaties, which they could take notice of; that the President is to see that treaties are observed. “If he decides against the treaty, to whom is a nation to appeal?” I told him the Constitution had made the President the last appeal. He made me a bow, and said that indeed he would not make him his compliments on such a Constitution, expressed the utmost astonishment at it, and seemed never before to have had such an idea.”

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have got the same Constitution to-day that excited the smiles of Citizen Genet in 1793. I can conceive of nothing more mischievous, more entirely mischievous, in the working of this Government than for Congress to plant itself on this resolution, and for this simple reason: in effect, it absolutely denies to the Executive a concurrent power in the foreign affairs of the Government. It ties up the Foreign Department of the Government just whenever any member chooses to bring a question before Congress, and so long as that question is pending in either House of Congress the Executive Department is stopped by the very terms of the resolution from making it even a subject of diplomatic correspondence. The resolution, indeed, specifically declares that “such proposition,” (that is, whatever may be introduced in either branch of Congress,) “while pending and undetermined, is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power.” To adopt this principle is to start out with a new theory in the administration of our foreign affairs, and I think the House has justified its sense of self-respect and its just appreciation of the spheres of the coördinate departments of Government by promptly laying the resolution on the table.

I think our foreign correspondence has been conducted wisely and well by the very distinguished statesman at the head of the Department of State. His highest eulogy is to be found in the eminent success that has attended his labors in a time of peculiar and unparalleled trial and trouble. It is wise to “let well enough alone,” and for one, I can never consent to a resolution passing this House that contains even an implied censure upon one to whom the country owes so much.

In regard to the resignation of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] from the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, my own feeling is but that of the entire House, when I express myself warmly against it. A gentleman of his ability cannot be spared from his responsible position, and I feel sure the House will insist on his continued service.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I am so obtuse that I cannot see the least analogy between the case cited by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the case now under consideration. The one was the interference of a foreigner, a proposal by him to ask Congress to interfere with treaty stipulations. Mr. Jefferson very properly told him that Congress had no right to interfere with treaty stipulations; for, as we all know, treaties are, by the Constitution, the supreme law of the land. That is the whole extent of the precedent to which the gentleman has referred; and how it has any bearing on this question I am unable to perceive.

Suppose Congress were to pass a law that no foreign Power should be permitted to establish a monarchy on the continent of North America—has not Congress the power to do it? Is that interfering with the executive or any other department of the Government? Is it not legitimately within the power of Congress to say that we will or we will not suffer thrones to be erected within our dominions or adjacent to them? If we can enforce it, well. I am not speaking of its policy. I am speaking of the powers of Congress. If such a declaration lead to war, then in Congress, and in Congress alone, lies the power to declare war. The President cannot do it. How, then, does it interfere with the executive prerogative for Congress to declare, by a joint resolution—which is a law of the land—a certain line of policy for the Government to pursue in this matter?

Sir, the question is as clear as the sun at noon-day, unless we are willing to stultify ourselves. Why was not this thought of at the last session of Congress, when the gentleman [Mr. BLAINE] and other gentlemen were present and suffered that resolution to pass unanimously? Why is it that they have just now waked up to a sense of their error, unless it is because, not the President—and that is wherein I somewhat censure this resolution—but one branch of the Executive Government took upon it to rebuke this body, and to inform foreign nations that we were an impertinent set of intermeddlers, and that the Executive of the nation would pay no respect to the action of this body, or, if you please, to the action of Congress, if the joint resolution had passed the Senate? I have no censure for anybody. We unanimously declared that a certain policy should be the policy of this nation, and we proposed to make it the law of the land. Foreign nations took some offense at it, as everybody knows that it was not in favor of foreign nations who have come on this continent against the traditional policy of the nation from the time of Monroe to the present time, and who are establishing thrones to surround this Republic in order that they may eventually establish them here. Does it not become this body and this Congress to say to them, Procul, Oprocul este, profani? "Keep out of the way, ye monarchical heretics, and do not attempt to interfere with the grand policy of the republicans of this country."

And are we to be intimidated because a foreign monarch chooses to find fault, and shall an agent of this Government humble the nation before him, and say that the action of this body means nothing; that the Representatives of the people recently chosen from all the districts of the nation are nothing; that their sense of policy means nothing; and that he need not trouble himself any further about it, but that the Secretary of State will take care that these impertinent boys shall do no harm? For that is precisely what he said; not perhaps in exactly that language, for I do not remember the language exactly.

Now, sir, the President does not interfere with the Foreign Minister in his policy. He is allowed to carry it on himself, and to be responsible for it. And it is only bringing him up to his responsibility that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, very much to their credit, brought in their resolution: to vindicate the dignity of this House and the dignity of this country, and to raise it from the low depth of degradation in which it had been placed by its Foreign Minister.

Now, I should have liked to have the resolution read a little differently; for it reads, "and it is the duty of the President to respect that policy." I think that is an unfortunate expression. The President probably had nothing to do with the matter. And when I have the opportunity I will test the sense of the House upon a little alteration of the phraseology of the same resolution, so that it shall read, "and it is the duty of the Executive Departments to respect that policy." Therefore, when I get the opportunity, I will again ask the sense of the House upon that question.

If we are mere nobodies in this matter, if we are mere mischief-makers, then let our lord and master in the chair of State rule and control us, and let us ask the pardon of the world for endeavoring to interfere somewhat in one of the most vital questions which can ever affect this nation.

I do not think I shall vote to excuse the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I do not look upon the vote of this House as any insult to that gentleman; I do not look upon that vote as any censure upon him. We have thoughtlessly acted upon the matter, perhaps, without having taken full opportunity for its consideration; and if the chairman of a committee is to consider himself personally offended when the House votes down propositions which he brings forward for our consideration, some of us would have been out of employment some time ago. [Laughter.] Why, sir, when my friend here [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] introduced his proposition to tax the stock of whisky on hand, and rode triumphantly through this House upon the head of the liquor, while I was completely submerged, I did not ask to be excused; it was a gentle ducking from which I expected to recover, hoping to come out renovated by the bath. [Laughter.] And I hope the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] will receive this in the same way, and consider that he can still serve the country with advantage in the position he now occupies, for I am sure that no man in this House or in the nation can be more properly put at the head of that committee.

Mr. ROUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, it was my misfortune to vote with the majority of this House upon the question of laying upon the table the resolution submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It may not, therefore, be inappropriate for me to state at least the impressions rather than opinions by which I was controlled. In the first place, I may say with reference to the important question before the House, that I cannot for one consent to the inference that the vote given by the majority was in any sense a reflection upon the honorable chairman of that committee. In this particular case the judgment of the House differs from the wishes of that gentleman. It is but a repetition of what has so often occurred in our experience, and I should be extremely sorry if the precedent should now be set that whenever a measure proposed by a committee of this House does not meet the approval of a majority of the members of this House, the chairman of that committee is to assume that it is a personal reflection upon him.

I know very well in this case that there is no gentleman upon this floor who enjoys to a greater, if to an equal, extent the respect and confidence of the members upon this side of the House, and, so far as I know, the respect and confidence of members on the other side. I trust, therefore, that the request made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. DAVIS] will not be granted.

Further, it seems to me that there is a slight misapprehension as to the force and nature of the fact involved in this subject. It is very well known that this House passed a resolution which was, in a certain sense, a redeclaration of the Monroe doctrine. That declaration was not sustained by the other branch of the national Legislature. Therefore the resolution could not be taken as in any sense the expression of the will of Congress; it was merely the expression of the will of the House.

Now, the resolution which the House has laid upon the table this morning is peculiar in its language upon that point. It is that "Congress," not this House, but that "Congress has a constitutional right and an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognizing of new Powers" as in other matters. If the resolution had stopped there I presume there would have been no gentleman upon this floor disposed to question the propriety of the resolution, supposing that there were facts existing, or supposed to exist, upon which the resolution could be properly based.

But it proceeds further, and declares that "it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy, not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law." This part of the resolution conveyed, by implication at least, the impression that the President has neglected to obey Congress in the exercise of the constitutional right of Congress to declare and prescribe, with an authoritative voice, the policy of the Government in reference to foreign affairs; while, in truth, the complaint made of the President, or of his Secretary of State, is that he neglected to obey the voice of this House when it undertook, by resolution, to set forth what the foreign policy of the country should be upon a particular matter, the judgment of this House having never been concurred in by the other branch of Congress. Therefore the President, so far as I know, at least upon the facts stated thus far in this discussion, is not subject to the imputation, even by implication, that he has neglected to obey the constitutionally expressed judgment of Congress in reference to the foreign policy of this country, but that merely he has neglected to obey the expressed judgment of this House, that judgment not having been concurred in by the other branch of Congress.

I admit that the manner in which the Secretary of State expressed his opinion as to the rights of this House in respect to foreign affairs was not agreeable to me; I should be glad, in some proper way, to protest against it; but I do not see how we are justified, even upon the language which he saw fit to employ, in arraigning the President for the neglect of the constitutional duty enjoined upon him to obey the will of Congress in reference to our foreign policy. He has neglected, as well as his Secretary, to be guided by the will of this House; but so far as I know, upon the facts stated in this debate, he has not disregarded the constitutionally expressed judgment of Congress in reference to our foreign policy.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, as I moved the tabling of the resolution reported by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] I wish simply to say that I made that motion from no disrespect to that gentleman—none whatever. I did not intend that the motion should be regarded at all as an attack upon either the gentleman from Maryland or the committee. There is no member of this House whose ability and fidelity command from me higher respect and admiration than I entertain for the gentleman from Maryland. As has been said here, if, when the House differs in judgment with a committee that reports a bill or a resolution, that fact is to be regarded as an indignity, on account of which members of the committee are to resign, there would be few committees left in this House. I do not think that, because the House differs in opinion with a gentleman as to the propriety of passing an abstract proposition such as was contained in this resolution, that fact should be regarded as an attack upon the judgment or the character or fidelity of the member.

I rose simply to say this in justice to myself as well as to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] whether he will not make the motion to reconsider the vote on the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I made the motion to reconsider, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman move to reconsider that?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not willing to do so.

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would be impossible under the rules.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish barely to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have the utmost confidence in the Committee on Foreign Affairs—the chairman and all the members of that committee; and I joined most heartily in the action of this House upon the resolution which emanated from that committee at the last session of Congress, carrying out what we supposed to have been the policy of our Government for a long series of years, and protesting against any foreign interference upon this continent in the establishment of monarchical Governments. I wish to stand, and I wish to live and die, by that doctrine. I should vote for that resolution again to-day, if it were brought before this House, notwithstanding what has occurred in the diplomacy of the country. I do think, also, that the action, perhaps, of one member of the Cabinet was uncalled for, when he reflected in a measure upon the action of this House of Congress. I believe that it was perfectly legitimate for us to express our views in regard to the interposition of France, irrespective of any action on the part of the coördinate branch, the Senate.

Now, sir, when this proposition came up this morning from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I was inclined to vote for its adoption. I voted against laying the proposition on the table. But upon further reflection, and upon an examination of the resolution, I was fearful that its phraseology conveyed a direct attack upon the Chief Executive of our nation; and, sir, I do not wish to lend my aid at this time to any such legislation as that. I verily believe that we have an Executive who is doing his utmost in a patriotic spirit to preserve unimpaired all the institutions of our country. I cannot, in view of the conduct of that man, consent to any vote upon the floor of this House that shall impugn his integrity in any respect whatsoever.

ever. If the phraseology of the resolution had been modified in some sort as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I should most cheerfully have voted for it; but I could not vote for it impugning the conduct of the President or any member of his Cabinet. That was the reason for my asking to change my vote and voting that the resolution should be laid on the table.

I do hope that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will reconsider his intention to retire from that committee. I think that the House has the most entire confidence in his wisdom and patriotism; and I ask him, as one member of that committee, to reconsider and withdraw his application to be discharged from it. If he does not feel inclined to do it—and I say the same to my colleague, [Mr. COX,] I say to all of the members of that committee, retain your position; but, sir, if they do not, if they ask to be discharged—I hope that the majority of the House will vote in the negative.

Mr. ROSS. I wish leave to record my vote on the motion that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I object. Mr. Speaker, I deem it incumbent now to object to a practice which has grown up of recording votes after the announcement of the decision of the House by the Chair, and especially the habit of recording votes on the next day. It has grown to such an extent as to seem to me to be full of mischief. I do not intend any personal application of the present suggestion; and I hope members will not consider it as any matter of ill nature on my part if I am constrained to object hereafter to the practice.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I will suggest that he offer a resolution on this subject, and let it go to the committee on the rules in order that we may establish a rule in that regard, in reference to changing votes, and also in reference to permitting members to vote who were not within the bar when their names were called. I think we will all agree that it is necessary, and will be beneficial, to have some rule on the subject.

Mr. DAWES. On that point I am satisfied with the rules as they were administered up to the present Congress. Till then they were not productive of any mischief. I think that a proper regard for the rules as they stand will be better than any effort of ours to change them. We have made one or two ineffectual efforts on that subject already. I think that we had better conform to the rules that we have.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will object at all times to members voting the day afterwards, and when they were not within the bar when their names were called, I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. DAWES. That was the purport of what I said I proposed to do, although I am much indisposed to place myself in that position. I only wish to call the attention of the House to it at this present moment. Pending the vote on laying the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] on the table, although members on both sides of the House were permitted to record their votes in contravention of the rules of the House, yet, when it appeared there was going to be a close vote, objection was made to members recording their vote.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I call the gentleman from Massachusetts to order. Neither the gentleman from Illinois nor the gentleman from Massachusetts has been discussing the question before us.

The SPEAKER. The debate has taken a very wide range, and the Chair has not felt it to be proper to check it, as the question is a very delicate one that has been presented by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Debate can properly only extend to whether the gentleman from Maryland shall be excused from service on that committee, and not to the merits of the resolution laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I did not propose to participate in the debate as to whether we shall excuse the gentleman from Maryland from serving on that committee; but now that I am up perhaps I should say a few words.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not restrict gentlemen unless objection be made.

Mr. DAWES. I was disposed at first, when the gentleman from Maryland asked to be excused from serving further upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for the reasons stated, to acquiesce and vote for excusing him; not from any national consideration, but from a desire to gratify the gentleman from Maryland. But I must say that when my friend from Ohio [Mr. COX] addressed the House in such feeling and pathetic terms, I was entirely overcome. The scene between the gentlemen from Maryland and Ohio was enough to affect the heart of almost any man who has not a heart of adamant. The distance from the sublime to the ridiculous, we are told, is but a step always; and I must say that the indignation which was manifested in the manner and in the matter of the gentleman from Maryland escaped me when the smooth and silver tones of the gentleman from Ohio announced to the House that he trusted the House would not yield to the request of the gentleman from Maryland because it would bring the House to the necessity of excusing him also. I changed my mind upon that, because I had not the heart to excuse both those gentlemen for the little time remaining of their services in the House. I thought it better that we should try to bear yet a little longer with their presence here, and not to part company with them before it had been so ordered by the people of their districts.

And I recollected, and my friend from Maryland will bear with me while I submit that I recollected, that the gentleman from Maryland never differed from committees in their reports; that the gentleman from Maryland always agreed with committees in their reports, and felt bound to respect them; and never, except when called upon by a high sense of duty, when the committee was present, or in their absence, denounced either the chairman or any member of a committee. And I recollected too, that he never went even so far as to announce to the House, in the absence of the chairman of a committee, that the committee themselves had so far violated and shocked the sense, not only of the House but of their constituents, that he was kind enough to commend—so I read in the Globe—the chairman and the committee to look to their positions at home rather than attend to their duties here.

How can I, with all these experiences and recollections, if the gentleman will bear with a member new in experiences of this kind, vote to excuse him merely because the House happened to differ with him upon the propriety of adopting this resolution? Why did not the gentleman, with such a record for the information of the House, recollect that when he on a former occasion asked leave of the House to report a resolution, the House suggested that he had better not report it; and that is the recorded judgment of the House to-day.

The gentleman has thrown himself upon the thick bosses of the buckle of the House this morning, and has got jilted. But I cannot see why he should not be permitted to occupy that place still longer, and therefore I shall vote against excusing him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me one word, as he will have the privilege of closing the debate?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I yield.

Mr. COX. I would not have troubled the House again but for the allusions of my friend from Massachusetts. Nature has so constituted him that he has been the first of all the members in this House to display his magnanimity by referring to our side of the House as the defeated portion of Congress. The gentleman might have had an opportunity to display his vindictive feeling upon that subject, and perhaps have done it a little more in order, on a question a little more connected with parliamentary decorum.

But it is true, as the gentleman intimates, that the places which now know many of us will soon know us no more forever; and we bow to it, if not with political yet with Christian resignation. We do not see anything in the Constitution by which we are bound to quit at the end of one year, after being elected for two. On the contrary we seemed to be compelled by the choice of our constituents, constitutionally made, to serve out the full term. It would be a little inconvenient in a pecuniary sense for a member, after serving here one year, to go home to his constituents, and by some strange freak of fancy on their part, by some popular fallacy, by some ingenious sophistry sent there, perhaps, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and finding his constituents against him, suddenly to resign.

But, sir, that is not pertinent to the matter before us. Whether I remain here any longer or not is not the question. I have been here about as long as my friend from Massachusetts thus far. New England controls this Government now, and he may be here for eight years longer. I remember that when he first came to Congress with myself, we were both placed upon the same committee. I was chairman of that committee, and the gentleman was then my subordinate. [Laughter.] He ought to recall those past associations, and not be so severe upon his former superior. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has done what no other gentleman on that side of the House, I venture to say, would have done, and that was to remind us here that we are beaten, to trample upon us again after we are defeated. [Laughter.] That is not brave. You will find only one illustration of it in all history and literature, and that was old Sir John Falstaff who killed Hotspur after he was dead. [Laughter.]

But the point in the debate to which I wish to reply was something more pertinent than this. I do not mean by that to say that the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts were impertinent in any bad sense, though they might be considered to be so by persons who do not understand our amicable relations. [Laughter.]

The other gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] who discussed this matter, cannot have carefully or critically examined this record. In my judgment, the President, when he called in question, not the action of Congress, but the power of Congress, raised an issue with this Congress. What the Secretary of State did the President did; and my colleague from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] ought not to shield his vote behind so flimsy a cloak as that the President is not responsible for the Secretary of State, who acts for the President only as the chief clerk of the Executive Department. The gentleman from Massachusetts could not have remembered the language of the chief clerk of the Executive when he said that this question of recognizing a monarchical Government, imposed on a neighboring republic, is a "purely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs, not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States;" thus claiming exclusive power and jurisdiction over these questions, ignoring utterly the right of Congress to pass on them, notwithstanding all the precedents of our history from the beginning of this Government down to the present time. He ought especially to have remembered those capital precedents made by Monroe, and Madison, and Clay, and John Quincy Adams, with respect to the Spanish American States, when Congress inaugurated the system of recognizing other republics and passing upon these matters of foreign relations. In spite of all these precedents, the Chief Executive lays down the rule that Congress has no power over this subject, but that it is purely an executive question. It is not a question whether the Senate has passed this measure of ours, or not, though I believe the Senate has not acted on it at all; it is not a question whether the resolution has become a law or not; it is a question between the Executive and Congress as to the power of Congress over this and other matters of a foreign nature.

If the gentleman will only read the learned report of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he will find that from February 9, 1821, when Henry Clay made a motion in the House of Representatives with reference to recognizing the Governments of Spanish America, running all the way through our history down to the bill for which the gentleman from Massachusetts voted himself, to recognize the black republics of Hayti and Liberia, Congress has always expressed itself, by bills, resolutions, and appropriations, upon these questions of international concernment. And yet my colleague from Ohio says that he would vote again for the resolution of last session as to Mexico and Maximilian, and in the same breath says that he would vote, and did vote, to table this resolution which declares "that Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters." How can my colleague be consistent? He says that he would vote for resolutions connected with foreign affairs, and yet he votes to discard a resolution which declares our power to interfere in such affairs! I leave it to the logic of my colleague to get out of this dilemma in which he places himself.

This resolution reported by our committee is not obnoxious on any ground except this, that it would seem in some way or other to strike at one of the Cabinet officers of the Administration. This is the only ground, I venture to say, upon which gentlemen can defend their votes, and one of the members upon the other side put it upon that ground.

What has become of our independence as a body? What has become of that old parliamentary dignity and fearlessness in criticism which belonged in the past to bodies of this nature, bodies for deliberation and debate? Are we to bow to the Executive in every behest which he may make?

The discarded resolution goes on to say "that it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy." The "duty of the President," that includes all his clerks, his chief clerk and all his Cabinet officers, so called.

Gentlemen say that they would have voted for this resolution if it were modified so as to read "the Executive Department." The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] said that. But the word "Executive," or "President," includes all these officers; and there was no reason for tabling the resolution except this, that it strikes at the policy of the Secretary of State, or the President for whom he speaks. And what is that policy? A policy which humiliates this country in the eyes of the world; a policy which placed us before France on our knees, with our mouths in the dust; which told the Emperor of France that we, the Congress of the United States, had no voice in this matter, but that this Government would humiliate itself in the dust before a foreign Power, and allow that Power to overturn all the cherished traditions of our nation, and to place and to perpetuate a throne upon this continent. Not such, sir, was the old policy of the better days of this Republic, when another policy and another party ruled in this country.

I was opposed to the excusing of my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because we need in this House fair, bold, open discussion from men like himself who dares to have his own opinion, even though his opinion may not coincide with that of the men in power. Let not this House, by its vote, cringe before the executive power. Let it stand up in its own self-defense and for its own privileges, for its own self-respect and its own dignity. Let it emulate something of the dignity and self-respect of the old parliamentarians of the better days of England, when men dared to go to the Tower, when men were drawn and quartered because they criticised the royal prerogatives which were unconstitutionally exercised. I hope my friend from Maryland will never have to go to any Bastille, and will never have to be drawn and quartered for any opinions that he may hold. But I do believe that he is of that fearless mold, having run counter to the sentiment of his own State, having belonged to organizations that had a good deal of physical and mental pluck about them, that he dare tell the truth even to the men in power. He did it last summer. And although I did not approve of his position then, nor of the position of the Executive, which sought to overthrow the privileges and powers of the House; although I did not believe that Congress had any power to reconstruct States any more than the Executive had, yet I did applaud his bold courage in speaking out for the rights of Congress in that regard, as I do to-day applaud his fearless criticism in that report of the conduct of the Secretary of State.

What the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said with regard to myself personally, and of the great difference between the member from Maryland and myself, no one appreciates more than I do; and I throw myself in an attitude of perfect humiliation before such a demi-god as the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] He has the advantage, which I have not, of being a member of the next House of Representatives. He is plumed for a fight in the next Congress. Let him wear his plume, but let him wear it gracefully. I have nothing to remark in regard to that gentleman's antecedents. I may, at some other time, have occasion to do that as fearlessly as I speak in favor of another member of the same party—the same who now asks to be excused from service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will, by its action on this question, sustain its own dignity; and with that I shall be content.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I regret that, in the discussion which has taken place, several topics have been introduced that were not very intimately connected with the simple and earnest application made to the House to relieve me from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

It was made in all earnestness and simplicity, from a profound sense of duty, and not from any personal feeling of discontent with the vote of the House. I was not in the least degree ruffled in my temper by the circumstance that the House has now, as it has done on so many occasions, differed from me in judgment. I have been brought up on defeats. I have lived in minorities. I always submit, and I trust with perfect humility, to the better judgment of the House. If any gentleman, in the course of my eight years' service in this House, has ever seen in my conduct any manifestation of personal spleen or personal disappointment, then may the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] be justified. If no man has on any occasion seen that, then I shall be pardoned for taking no further notice of the mean malice that prompted them.

But, I do not wish to be misunderstood upon another point. It has been repeatedly stated that this resolution assails the President. Well, sir, I am ready to assail the President or anybody else who stands across the broad track of republican principles. I need not say that in this House. And yet, sir, there is no word in that resolution which assails the President. Nor was it contemplated to assail him. It was carefully, deliberately, critically prepared, and received the approval of every member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with the dissenting voice alone of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POMEROY.]

I beg the attention of the House to the language of the resolution. The rights that it asserts I do not now pretend to debate. The judgment of the House has been rendered, to which I shall bow, and bow without an argument.

The resolution was not a cobweb of my brain, brought here to hang fine dissertations upon about the abstract rights of different departments of the Government. This House had asserted its authority in matters of the gravest national importance, events which had arrested the attention of the civilized world, and made anxious the heart of every friend of liberty in it. A free nation on our borders lay bleeding in the talons of the French eagle, and a vagrant adventurer who had never seen the soil of Mexico called himself her emperor. The American House of Representatives had declared that it did not accord with our policy to recognize any monarchical Government erected on the ruins of any republican Government in America, least of all in Mexico, our neighbor and our friend. It did not relate to remote or possible contingencies, but to a bloody, awful reality, the ruin of a free nation by European violence, under false pretenses, and with an insolent hostility to our power; a ruin now more nearly consummated, and by our fault, ay, and still more by the fault of those charged with the conduct of our diplomatic intercourse. But that resolution had rested in the Senate. We had done all that we could, and we were obliged to rest in silence.

But when the Secretary of State of the United States sent abroad a dispatch to a foreign Government, relative to a matter then pending within the legislative department of the United States, where the Executive eye has no right to penetrate; respecting the vote on which, until communicated to him in the regular form, he has no right to know anything; when at that stage the Secretary of State saw fit to enter into diplomatic communication with a foreign Government, in order to rob the vote of this House of its legitimate moral power before it had acquired any legislative authority, and in doing that not only questioned the wisdom and expediency, but the right of this House, and of both Houses, to say one word upon that subject, I could not sit in silence, and the House will find, I think, that they will be unable to do so, if they have a due regard to their dignity as one of the branches of this Government.

And it was in deference to that practical, actual case that the resolution was drawn; drawn carefully, drawn critically, drawn with a studious avoidance of every innuendo against the personal character either of the President of the United States or of the distinguished gentleman who presides so ably over the Department of State; and the language of his letter, to which the language of the resolution refers, will show how carefully it was adapted to this object, and how completely it accomplished it. The Secretary of State says:

"It is, however, another and a distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time."

If it be another question whether the United States would think proper to express themselves at this time and in the form that the House of Representatives have seen fit to use, who speaks for the United States?

The Secretary says:

"This is a practical and purely executive question"—

There the Executive speaks for the United States!—

"and the decision of it constitutionally belongs, not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States."

Then the President is the United States! Do gentlemen now understand how the word "President" came there? It was because the Secretary of State had told the French Government, with a view to break the force of the vote of the House of Representatives that it belonged, not to the House of Representatives, nor to Congress, but exclusively to the President of the United States, to declare what the United States thought, and when it was expedient to declare what it thought in reference to our foreign affairs; and foreign affairs mean war, and peace, and alliances, and recognitions, and neutrality, and every interest and every right by which we touch the nations of the world, and that in the face of the formal words of the Constitution, ascribing those functions in whole or in part to one or both Houses of Congress.

It was that declaration, in conflict with all the precedents of the United States, that the Secretary of State saw fit not merely to express here in the ordinary intercourse between the departments of the Government, but to send abroad to our minister in France, and lay before a foreign Government, and to impeach and discredit the judgment of Congress before it was pronounced, which imperatively required to be rebuked. And it was at that language that the resolution was pointed. Now, judge ye, whether it be true or not, that Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in our foreign affairs. That raises the issue directly, does it not, with the language, not with the person even of the Secretary of State, whether "Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters, and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy, not less in matters of negotiation than in the use of the national force when authorized."

It was no blow aimed at the President. But a right had been asserted for the President by the Secretary of State. He first impeached the right of Congress to do what it has always done, and usurped its right for one of the flowers of the presidential prerogative. I deny his law and his fact. I make the question of right and not of person, either with the Secretary of State or with the President.

And then, "whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives," the Secretary tells the world is an executive question! We cannot allow our votes to be received other than in the constitutional form of a veto by the President; then he has the right to approve or refuse to approve them in the forms of his constitutional authority.

But I have yet to learn that it is the right of the President to say what is necessary and proper, or what is wise or what is unwise with reference to any vote of this House or of both Houses of Congress, except when our votes are communicated for his approval or disapproval; therefore, to make the issue direct with the other portion of the Secretary's letter, this clause is introduced:

"And the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it."

That is the assertion, that our vote is not the subject of executive criticism; that it is the right of the people of the United States to say what they will upon their foreign policy, and it is the duty of the President to veto or obey it. But, sir, if Congress have sunk so low that it must look beyond the limits of its own Halls to vindicate the necessity and propriety of this solemn declaration of national policy at this time in the form we adopted, perhaps we can find no arbiter between us and the Executive Government which it will recognize so readily as the Baltimore convention; and that enlightened body, forced by public opinion, thought it necessary and proper to echo the resolution for which the Secretary apologized—only in attempting to give a rebuke the form of a compliment, they converted it into a sarcasm.

That is the substance of the resolution. Now, sir, I say again that I do not mean to debate the policy of the resolution or any matter connected with it. Nobody except the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has impeached it here upon historical grounds. With great respect to that gentleman, I say that the precedent which he quotes is frivolously irrelevant, and that, from the beginning of the Government until this day, there is no vote of either House of Congress, there is no claim by any President of the United States, there is no assertion by any Secretary of State, there is no expression by any respectable public man of any party, that it does not belong to the Congress of the United States to declare and prescribe the foreign policy of the United States; and from the time of the Panama mission, when John Quincy Adams asked and obtained the authority and support of Congress for that great mission which we must soon repeat, until this day, we have vote on vote of Congress, under almost every Administration, affirming, implying, asserting, or exerting that prerogative without question from any quarter; and under this Administration more than one act approved by President Lincoln himself add to the unbroken law of precedents. The recognition of Hayti and Liberia was not the spontaneous act of the President, but he, like his predecessors, waited till Congress had authorized him to open with them international relations.

Sir, there is but one judgment and one course of precedent from the beginning to the end of American history. Monroe concurred in it; the messages of John Quincy Adams are replete with it; General Jackson, in the case of Texas, recognized it; Mr. Clay asserted it; Mr. Webster asserted it. What other authorities are worthy of notice, after we have named these? That, sir, is all I have to say on that subject.

Now, sir, one other word. I have already said that, in asking to be excused from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I act from no feeling of personal pique. I make that request from my sense of public duty, in view of the relations that the chairman of the committee necessarily bears to the House of Representatives. It is possible, sir, upon many occasions for the House to differ, not only with the chairman of a committee, but with the committee. They are bound to take the instructions of the House; they are bound to conform to such instructions. They are bound by the judgment of the House, and they must act in conformity with it.

But the position of the chairman of a committee means that he stands there as the representative of the political views of the majority of the House of Representatives. He is to the House of Representatives what a member of the Cabinet is to the President. An absolute conformity on all essential principles between the chairman of a committee and the House on a subject respecting which the committee is raised, is essential to a due discharge of his duties, just as a similar relation between a Cabinet officer and the President is essential to the due conduct of executive affairs. I am not the representative of the House upon this question. The vote of this morning places a great gulf between me and the House of Representatives. I cheerfully admit that they may be right and I may be wrong; but the criterion of my conduct must be my own judgment, and I cannot separate myself from the history of America to conform to the vote of the House of Representatives.

And, sir, I go a step further. Not only is it impossible that I should continue to represent the House in that responsible situation without misrepresenting myself, but, insignificant as I may be personally, I am unwilling, when this matter crosses the ocean, as it will cross it, I cannot consent to seem to submit to or acquiesce in or to have part or lot with this grave surrender of the power of the people. For, Mr. Speaker, whatever the insignificance of the person who moves this question, his connection with this vote elevates him to its importance; and I tell you there is more than one crowned head in Europe that now looks anxiously to the conduct of this House upon this very question, and a shout will go up from one end of despotic Europe to the other when it is known that the House of Representatives has confessed that its resolves are vain breath before the dictation of the President, and that the President is the United States, as Louis Napoleon is France. Insignificant though I be, I am not humble enough to allow my name to be associated with that humiliating abdication.

With all kindness to the gentlemen who have so kindly expressed themselves here to-day; a kindness which overwhelms me sensibly; a kindness frequently expressed heretofore in private, but never before so publicly, I beg that they will not let that kindly feeling enter into consideration on this vote, but will do as I ask them—simply relieve me from acting longer in this responsible situation where I so gravely misrepresent the House which has honored me.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the members of this House who voted to lay this resolution on the table. It has been assumed in this debate that that vote indicated an opinion upon the subject-matter of the resolution itself. For one, sir, I wish it understood that I have advanced no opinion upon the resolution. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs introduced a resolution of very grave importance; he immediately moved the previous question; and, without the right to discuss the resolution, without the right to improve its phraseology, we were put upon a vote. So long as I hold a seat on this floor I never will, under such circumstances, be forced to give an opinion upon a grave national question. I voted, therefore, to lay the resolution on the table, first, because there was no opportunity for discussion, and secondly, because I believed it inexpedient at this time, in this crisis of our country's history, to bring up here any such disturbing question.

Sir, the time will come when England and France will understand the position of the American people on the question referred to by the gentleman from Maryland.

Now, sir, no man entertains more respect for the private character, the public position, and the integrity of the gentleman from Maryland than myself, and I trust this House will unanimously vote not to excuse him from serving on that committee.

The motion was disagreed to, and Mr. Davis, of Maryland, was not excused.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged question, and submit the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when this House adjourns on Thursday, the 22d instant, it adjourn to meet on Thursday, January 5, 1865.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to say one word. It is pretty clear that we shall adjourn over the Christmas holidays. It would be impossible to keep the House together, and we should gain nothing by refusing to adjourn. On consultation, we have supposed that it would be better to fix the time as I have suggested. I have fixed, first, Thursday next, so that members living at a distance shall have opportunity to reach their homes. New Year's day comes on a Sunday, and of course members cannot leave or travel on that day, and I have fixed on Thursday, the 5th, for their return.

For myself, I am willing to sit here all the time and attend to the public business.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEVADA.

Mr. BEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce, and put on its passage, a bill supplementary to an act to enable the people of the Territory of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the bill reported from the Committee on Territories?

Mr. BEAMAN. No, sir; but I will make a statement which I think will be satisfactory. In the act which was passed enabling the people of the Territory of Nevada to form a constitution for admission as a State into the Union there was an entire omission to save the proceedings in the Supreme Court arising by appeal or otherwise from the courts in that Territory. I understand that there are appeals now pending in the Supreme Court, and there being no provision to save them it becomes necessary to pass this supplementary act. I think, sir, there can be no objection to its immediate passage.

There being no objection, the bill was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report from the committee on the rebellious States a bill to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government, in order that it may be recommitted and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the gentleman will move to reconsider and lay that motion on the table I will not object.

Mr. ASHLEY. I have no desire to bring the bill back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. PENDLETON. Very well, then.

The bill was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT ERIE.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing a marine hospital at Erie, on Lake Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call up House joint resolution No. 124, explanatory of an act entitled "An act providing internal revenue for the support of the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to give notice to the House that on Friday, the 6th of January, I propose to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution for amending the Constitution of the United States was rejected, and at that time to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. COX. To take a vote upon it that day?

Mr. ASHLEY. To take it up for consideration.

Mr. COX. I desire to say to the gentleman that members on this side of the House, generally, would prefer that he postpone the consideration of the matter until the Monday following the day named by him.

Mr. ASHLEY. Upon consultation with a number of members upon that side of the House favorable to the motion, I give notice that the vote will be taken on the Monday following the day I first named.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up and consider the bill of the House No. 597, in the House, and not in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday the Committee of Ways and Means reported the invalid pension bill, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-day. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that it may be taken up and considered in the House. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 597) making appropriations for the payment of invalid pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, was accordingly taken up for consideration, and read in extenso.

Mr. BROOKS. I presume there is nothing in this bill except what is contained in the estimates of the Department?

Mr. STEVENS. Nothing else.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that bill No. 598, the consular and diplomatic bill, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-day, be taken up and considered in the same way as the last.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, was taken up and read in extenso.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to have this bill read through again for amendments, for I presume there are few to be offered. I have, however, an amendment to offer to the last section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be considered as opened to amendment generally. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, however, That in the payment of the salaries provided for by this bill, the same shall be paid upon the basis of the currency of the United States, as other salaries are paid, including the usual exchange only.

The only question presented by the amendment is one which has frequently been before the House before; and that is whether these salaries of agents abroad shall be paid upon a gold basis, instead of the basis of the currency of the country. It has always seemed to me that there was no reason for this discrimination, and that these salaries ought to be paid upon exactly the same basis with other salaries of the country, and upon the same ground.

Mr. STEVENS. I must oppose that amendment. This Government already, by one portion of its legislation, has created a distinction between different kinds of the lawful money of the United States, and by that we have made one article three times as valuable as the other, and by that legislation alone, as I contend. Now, by law there is no difference between coin and legal-tender notes. The Government has a right to pay in whatever it chooses, and if it chooses to pay in legal-tender notes, it can do so; if it chooses to pay in coin it can do so. And there is no exception to this rule except that we unwisely made it in the payment of duties and of interest on the public debt. I am unwilling to recognize any further distinction, and thus depreciate what we have declared to be lawful money and legal tender of the United States. I would leave the Government to make these payments according to their judgment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to call the attention of the House once more to the provisions contained in lines thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen. I did it last session, and shall do it now in all probability with as little use as I did it then. It is a provision for missions in Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras, and San Salvador, five of the Central American States, most of which have not a population as large as some of the wards of Cincinnati, Philadelphia, or New York. To those five States we have five distinct ministers, when one minister to Central America could transact all the necessary business. I make now the same proposition that I made last year, to strike out the names of these five States and insert "Central America."

Mr. STEVENS. It is impossible to get at what the gentleman desires in this way. We have a law authorizing the appointment of these ministers; they are appointed in pursuance of law, and we are bound to make the appropriation to pay them. We cannot change that law in an appropriation bill. If the gentleman wishes to get at it, let him bring in a bill to repeal the law authorizing these several missions and concentrate them, and then we will make the appropriation accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that is precisely what I propose to do. If he will look to the Statutes he will find that these missions were never created by any express statute law, but were created in this very appropriation bill. The missions were created here, and I propose to repeal them.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is mistaken. The general law authorizes the Executive to send ministers to certain places, and to select those places.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg the gentleman from Pennsylvania to show me any other law except that in an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I refer to the general law for the appointment of ministers.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman can show me no law whatsoever except in appropriation bills of precisely this character. The statute-books are before him, he has an assistant and a clerk, and I challenge him to produce any other law except laws in appropriation bills.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is entirely right about the matter. There is a general law providing for these various ministers, and they are to be appointed by the President. Whenever the President chooses to send ministers to these various second-class missions he does so in pursuance of the general law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me, the power of the President of the United States is derived from the Constitution of the United States, as he will see by reading the second section.

Mr. COX. And the law passed in pursuance thereof.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It has been decided over and over again that without any law, under the provisions of the Constitution, the President can send ministers anywhere.

Mr. BROOKS. And who is to pay them?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The President having appointed a minister, under the Constitution, it then becomes the duty of Congress to appropriate the money to pay him.

Mr. BROOKS. That is the old story we had this morning over again—the same principle—that the President of the United States can do anything, that he can appoint a minister to any place whatsoever, and that all we have to do is to perform the clerk's duty of making a record of appropriations for such missions as he may direct.

Now, the President may have the power under the Constitution of the United States to send ministers anywhere abroad, but the right is reserved to this House—the great right of making an appropriation therefor or not making it as we deem best.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] I wish him to show me a statute law which creates missions to Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras, and San Salvador.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from New York is probably familiar with the law passed in 1861, I think, drawn by Judge Perkins, of Louisiana. That was while the gentleman was a member of Congress, and that law divides the missions up into various classes. That carries out the constitutional provision by the action of Congress and gives Congress control of the matter.

If the gentleman wants to get rid of these various missions, the way to do it is to repeal the law declaring these second-class missions and fixing the salaries thereof.

The gentleman proposes to unite all these several second-class missions into one mission to Central America. That was done a good many years ago, before we had any commerce on the Isthmus, before the railroad was made, and before commerce was quite as great as it now is in New York and other places. But at this time there are interests on the Isthmus and in Central America connected with all these Governments that require ministers at these various points. There are claims against these Governments, some of them no doubt held by constituents of the honorable gentleman, and treaties are to be made, and conventions are to be held, and these claims are to be adjusted.

There are claims springing out of the old troubles in Nicaragua, the troubles which occurred with General Walker, and in all of which our countrymen were more or less mixed up. All these matters are to be settled by ministers, and you cannot have one minister traveling all around in that volcanic and thinly settled region.

Mr. DAWES. We did have one.

Mr. COX. Yes; we had one traveling there once, who got lost, and did not turn up for four or five years after his time expired. But even if the objection raised by the gentleman from New York were rightly taken, it would not be proper, through an appropriation bill, to strike out these salaries, for the ministers are there now doing their duty, and that duty is very valuable to the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I think we all understand how our ministers abroad are created and appointed. Their appointment is vested by the Constitution in the President. But Congress undertook to classify these ministers, to fix the point at which most of them should be kept, and to fix their salaries. The ministers to France and England have their salaries fixed by law, and so have the ministers to these Central American States. Until that law is repealed or changed the ministers appointed by the President are entitled to their salaries, and it is the duty of Congress to make appropriations to pay them. The President has a right to appoint them, and he has appointed them and sent them to their respective stations, their salaries having been fixed by Congress in an act passed twelve or fourteen years ago. Now what have we to do? Simply to make an appropriation to fulfill the law. The law says that these men shall have certain salaries. If the gentleman from New York will bring in a law repealing or changing that fixing these salaries of ministers, well and good. Then there will be no appropriations made to pay them. But, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has well said, that would be very unwise in the present condition of our affairs and in the present condition of Europe, with Spain making war upon some portions of South America and France having designs upon other portions. It would be, I say, very unwise for us to withdraw our ministers at those places.

Now, as to fixing one particular place for a minister to Central America, where the interests of States are diverse, and where war constantly exists between them, it would seem to me very unwise and impracticable. I do not know but that it was the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who was engaged in a two-years hunt to find the seat of government of the Argentine Confederation, and I believe he did not find it then, though he come upon some fresh symptoms of where it had recently been.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman's illustration is not a good one. The Government of the Argentine Confederation was found and recognized, and treaties were made with it.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, there was somebody, I remember, though it could not have been the gentleman from Ohio, who was for three years engaged in hunting for some Central American Government.

A MEMBER. Mr. Smith.

Mr. STEVENS. Ah, yes—Mr. Smith. That is the man I mean. It is said that he never returned, but is in search of that Government yet. [Laughter.] I do not know how it is. I should be entirely satisfied if he never found it, and never returned. But I think we had better leave this thing as it is.

Mr. BROOKS. The idea of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] that Central America needs these five ministers because it is necessary to have somebody to do business at each place, is well answered by this very appropriation bill. If the gentleman will look over it he will find among the consulates, in schedule B, handsome appropriations made for a consul at Panama, at San Juan del Sur, at Balize, at Aspinwall, at San Juan del Norte, and at various other places—without entering into an enumeration of them—appropriations for a consulate in every part of Central America. Now, I can understand that which seems to be the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens,] and will reply to it by and by, but I do not understand the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] I can well understand why the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not desire to cut down missions, does not desire to deprive men of places, does not desire to bring home anybody who is enjoying the patronage and expenditure of this Government. And I cannot understand how the people on that side of the House, who pay income taxes, and taxes of all kinds, as well as those on this side of the House, should desire to keep up five expensive missions in Central America, to a people who have a consulate in every important port, or to States which, I repeat, have not so large a population as many of the wards in the several cities of this Union.

These missions were created at a very late period, and almost always, not only by the Democratic party, but by the Republican party, in order to provide places for certain office seekers; not because of any necessity that existed for the missions, but to give place to people who could not be provided for in Europe, Asia, Africa, or in South America, and for whom, therefore, places were invented in this Central America. The mission for Honduras, I think, was created especially for a gentleman from my own State, for whom no other place could be provided, and to whom this special mission was given, long after this general law of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] speaks. It was introduced here by a gentleman who was then a member of Congress from the State of Louisiana. The gentleman, I am quite sure, will not find any record of that mission in the general law he speaks of, if he searches through the statute from beginning to end.

Now, I have no wish to deprive any gentleman of place. There are places enough for everybody; there are good offices enough, in connection with our annual expenditure of $1,000,000,000, to provide places for almost everybody who is in search of them in our own domain, upon our own coast, to prevent the smuggling of goods into Canada and the provinces, and in connection with our own internal revenue. And if these gentlemen must have places, then I repeat they ought to be brought home, except one to preside over our interests in Central America, and the consulates to be left behind, and places given them upon the frontier of Canada to prevent smuggling, and in our own land to collect our internal revenue.

But I will not make any further opposition. I have brought this subject to the attention of members, and the responsibility is now upon the other side of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is but a renewal—

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order; that further debate on this amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The same rules in regard to debate upon this bill prevail in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, limiting debate to one speech on each side of the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I will move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will insist upon the rule, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] shall confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to strike out "six" instead of "five," and to insert the words "and to the Sandwich Islands."

Mr. COX. I raise the point of order upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] that there is no such place as Central America.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest that the Sandwich Islands are already in.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I move to strike it out.

Mr. COX. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to move to insert "League Island." [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is one that came before us last year from the same source, and it seems to me that the objections that were raised against the proposed amendment then are peculiarly strengthened now. I do not know but the gentleman's objection to homogeneity influences him in this motion. He may be afraid that American ideas, the English language, our thoughts, our habits, our customs may become fixed in those American States. There never was a time for many reasons when we wanted the influence of America in each of those States so much as now. The influence of France is felt in every one of them.

It was but this morning that I was reading a letter at my desk from one of the most intelligent of our American people who have ever been engaged in the missionary cause in that section of the country, or upon this continent, deploring the fact that we had not those able statesmen, men speaking our language and the language of the country, to counteract the influence of France, which is penetrating and permeating those States.

And it struck me as the message of the President was read, that for once we had got a truly American message. It relates to the States of this continent, and one after another our relations to them are indicated and explained. France is only so far recognized as to say that civil war still exists in Mexico. The French empire is recognized as a belligerent only; and at this time the policy of the country should be to Americanize those States. The effort now making is a part of the general effort to prevent the extension of civilization, of republican ideas, and of American thought to the Central American States. The probability of homogeneity there has already been recognized. It is the old battle that was fought against Liberia and against Hayti. We were not to recognize them; we were not to treat with them. We were to have neither connection nor intercourse with them, because we did not like the complexion of the people.

And to strike from this bill those States which may receive a minister, those States which have people whose institutions and whose course of policy we may influence and control, and to insert the name of a Government which does not exist, which three ministers consecutively have been unable to find, is to say that for the coming year we shall be voiceless in Central America—that we shall have no official agent to indicate to us the encroachments of France. And why? Is it because gentlemen believe that a great empire is yet to be constructed south of the Potomac? Is it because gentlemen have been impregnated with the views of Louis Napoleon in behalf of a Latin empire? Or is it for fear that the influence of our country in those States may show that "homogeneity" may be attained while freedom of religion prevails, while manifold forms of government prevail, and in spite of the fact that men in tropical climates intermingle irrespectively of the question of complexion.

I simply wished to renew this train of suggestion, which I presented when this same insidious move was made last year; and in doing so, I have accomplished my purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise for the purpose of moving that the debate on the pending amendment be terminated in one minute; but, before making that motion, I desire to say a single word.

I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] as well as that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] At the present time our relations with all these Governments are of the most friendly character; and it is very important to us that we shall keep them so. It would be a little singular, if we are to dispense with our missions to any point, that we should first select American republics, about which so much solicitude has been manifested in this House this morning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that, at the present time, it is almost impossible for a minister at some of these Governments to do any duty in connection with others, in consequence of the difficulty of changing places of abode. The transit from one to another takes so much time that it would be utterly impossible for these ministers to discharge their duties acceptably, either to the Government or the parties interested, if they should be obliged to travel from one place to another in the attempt to perform duty in connection with several Governments.

I now move that all debate upon the pending amendment be terminated in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY's amendment to the amendment of Mr. Brooks was not agreed to.

Mr. Brooks's amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. With the view of making a remark in reply to my friend from New York, I move to amend by striking out "Paraguay" and "Costa Rica." This is perhaps the only occasion on which we shall have the opportunity to discuss these matters with reference to these republics. The House seems to have declared, by the vote of this morning, that it is not within the province of Congress to look much, if at all, after foreign affairs; yet now we are at it, within scarcely more than an hour after the House has voted in that way.

I would remind my friend from New York that it is exceedingly important for us to continue all our ministers at these various points in Central America, if for no other reason than that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] Those Governments in Central America to-day stand well with all the world. They are improving, both in their stability and in their credit—Costa Rica especially.

The gentleman from New York is a little confused about his geography. He says that we have a consul at Panama, &c., and that those officers could attend to all the business connected with these various missions. The gentleman ought to understand that Panama is in South America, in the United States of Colombia, formerly New Granada; and he could not expect any business at Panama to refer to the Central American States.

We have, sir, other relations upon the Isthmus, besides those of Panama. We have relations growing out of the Nicaragua transit and canal; and just now it is exceedingly significant, after steps are being taken by the Central American States with a view to prevent French interference and French domination there, as well as in Mexico, that the present action should be proposed in this House. If there ever was a time when we should have American diplomats at all of those courts, it is now, when the power of the French emperor and the Archduke Maximilian is being pushed in those regions.

There are a great many matters in relation to those States yet to be determined by the State Department. That Isthmus is the most important part of the world, speaking commercially and diplomatically. There has been as much diplomacy about it as any of the larger empires of Europe, because it will be one day the great center of the oriental and occidental traffic of the world. We ought to have our ministers there strengthened at all times. It is the connecting link between our eastern or Atlantic and our Pacific States. It is important that we should have our ministers strengthened at every Government. It is not merely necessary that we should strengthen our consuls, because those Governments will not correspond with consuls on matters connected with arrests of traitors, with the passage of troops across the Isthmus, and with all of the questions growing up connected with our civil war. I submit that the proposition should not only be received with an earnest protest, but should be voted down.

I withdraw my amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF GOODS.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill asked by the Treasury Department, which it is necessary should be passed before the holidays or there will be a forfeiture of goods. If this is passed the Committee of Ways and Means will have no objection to an adjournment over till Monday next. It is a bill to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from certain stores.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this bill to be considered in connection with the act passed at the last session of Congress? How does it affect that act?

Mr. STEVENS. I will state in a single word the effect of the bill. By the law, as it now stands, all goods in the bonded warehouses were to be exported or sent to the Pacific coast within three years, the duties were to be paid, and they were to be debarred from the privilege of exportation. A great many goods were in the warehouses then, and the time virtually expired in January. Among these goods were arms and munitions of war. By the proclamation of the President, owners were prohibited from exporting these goods. They were compelled, therefore, to leave them where they were, and by the original law unless they were exported before January they were forfeited to the United States. All that is now asked is that the time during which, by the proclamation of the President, they were prohibited from exporting them, shall not be counted against them, and that they shall be allowed the same time they would have had if the proclamation had never been made. In other words, it is asked that that time shall not be charged against them so as to work a forfeiture of their goods for not exporting them when they were unable to do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. My impression was that this conflicted with the law of the last session; but I find it does not, and I therefore do not object.

The bill was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. After the statement that the Committee of Ways and Means has no more business to present, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan railroad of the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864.

The bill, which was read for information, provides that the seventeenth section of the act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company be amended so as to extend the time for the completion of said railroad for two years from the passage of said act; and furthermore repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The company desires this for the reason that their vessel containing lumber has been carried out to sea, and they have not been able to get the lumber.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at twenty minutes past three o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, December 19, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

Hon. JOHN P. HALE, of New Hampshire, appeared in his seat to-day.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I ask leave to present the petition of Elias H. Chambers, praying to be indemnified for the loss of certain Treasury notes destroyed by fire. There are many cases of this kind occurring, and I think it would be well to refer the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary, that they may inquire into the propriety of making some general law on this subject. I therefore move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present the memorial of ex-General Willis A. Gorman, who represents that an act passed at the last session giving R. G. Murphy $800, was accompanied by a remarkable and unusual averment, that "that account" was "charged to, and paid by him, as agent for the Sioux Indians upon false vouchers transmitted to the Indian Bureau by Willis A. Gorman, late superintendent of Indian affairs for the north-western superintendency." He says this does him gross injustice, and that he has long been ready and able to make the matter clear, and he asks that he may be relieved from this imputation. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Claims, from which the bill emanated.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition which is in the following terms:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, your petitioners, pray you to enact a law to secure a republican form of government and abolish and forever prohibit slavery in the United States.

This is signed by Henry Ward Beecher, of No. 82 Columbia street, Brooklyn, New York, and some three thousand citizens of New York. I move that it be referred to the select Committee on Slavery and Freedmen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers of the Army, praying for an increase of their pay and allowances; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of citizens of Henry county, Iowa, and a petition of citizens of Clayton county, Iowa, praying for a repeal of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain as a matter of justice to the agricultural interests of the North-west; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of acting assistant paymasters of the Navy praying to be allowed the rank and pay of lieutenants in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Surgeon Benjamin Vreeland, United States Navy, praying to be allowed the difference between the compensation of a surgeon and a passed assistant surgeon from the date when he was entitled to his examination by law to the date of his passing the examination; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of citizens of Cook county, Illinois, praying for the passage of a uniform bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of citizens of California praying for the passage of House bill No. 560, to amend the "Act to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Soseol ranche," which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARLAN presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Colorado Territory, urging the adoption of legislation by which the title to mineral lands may be confirmed to the occupants; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the presbytery of Cincinnati, praying that the Constitution may be so amended as to recognize the existence of God; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a memorial of the Western Associated Press, praying for a repeal of the duty on foreign printing paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emolument of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 18, 1862, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 103) to define the pay and emolument of chaplains in the United States Army and volunteer forces, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been acted on at the last session of Congress; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons, residents of certain States, into the regiments of other States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 231) concerning the subsistence and pay of the Army, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. FOOT. I ask to be excused from service upon the Committee on the Judiciary. Being placed on four of the standing committees of the body, I find it impracticable to attend the meetings and the duties assigned to these several committees, and I therefore ask to be excused from that one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the vacancy be filled by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I notice in the proceedings of the Senate; that during my absence the Senate have done me the honor to place me in the position of chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I must throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate to excuse me from that service. In making this request, I do not ask to be discharged from serving on the committee; I am ready to render such service as I may to the Senate and to the committee; but it is a committee of which I have never been a member, and I have known nothing of its business, and I see upon the committee several gentlemen who have been for some years members of the committee, perfectly acquainted with the character of the business and its routine, and vastly better able to discharge the responsible duties of chairman of the committee than I am myself. I therefore hope the Senate will excuse me from serving as chairman of the committee.

The request was granted.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, it was Ordered, That so much of the 35th rule of the Senate as relates to the appointment of the chairman of committees be suspended, as regards the appointment of the chairman of the committee on the District of Columbia, and that the said chairman be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 222) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana;

A joint resolution (S. No. 83) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in the conflict with the piratical craft the Alabama, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 84) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, United States Navy, and to the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albemarle, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 597) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 601) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;"

A bill (H. R. No. 603) to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from public stores; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 124) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when this House adjourns on Thursday, the 22d of December, 1864, it adjourn to meet on Thursday, January 5, 1865.

DEFENSE OF THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 361) to enable the President to expend the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in his opinion, in building fortifications and floating batteries to defend our northern frontier and the commerce of the lakes against the attacks of piratical and hostile expeditions organized in the British provinces by the enemies of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. Should that go to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is not material to me.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not on the Committee of Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it had better go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and letting it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. I will suggest to the Senator that that question has already been submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and this might therefore properly follow what has already been done.

Mr. SUMNER. I think, probably, a reference to the Committee on Military Affairs will be better; but I hope the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] will report speedily upon the subject of the general defenses of the lakes, and also upon the question of the reciprocity treaty. I do not wish to discuss it now; but there is a great deal of anxiety on the border, which is increasing daily, and which will probably lead to breaches of the peace and infractions of international law. I hope, therefore, the Senator will act on the question of the reciprocity treaty and those other questions as speedily as possible, in order to allay the apprehensions that are felt on the border.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOWARD. I concur entirely with the Senator from Ohio in the expression of the hope that the committee to whom this bill shall be referred will make as early a report as practicable on the subject; for, as has been justly observed by the Senator from Ohio, there is indeed and in truth a state of very great anxiety and concern along the whole frontier, and we are in daily and almost hourly danger of repetitions from Canada of those raids and outrages which have been so frequently committed upon our peaceful people on the borders. I think it is high time that there should be an expression of opinion and of feeling on the part of the Congress of the United States, at least by way of remonstrance, against those raids and outrages to which I have referred. In order to keep peace along our border, we must show our power. The lion must show his teeth on this side of the border in order to preserve the peace, and teach those men who have been harboring these rebel vipers in their bosoms, that even Canada, with its so-called neutrality, cannot be permitted to be a place of refuge for such characters. I desire to say this on the present occasion, and when another occasion shall present itself I shall go more extensively into a consideration of the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to differ from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations if he thinks this subject should go to that committee; but it seems to me it is not the appropriate committee. This is a question which concerns the defenses of the country. It is true we have the reciprocity treaty before the Committee on Foreign Relations at the suggestion of the honorable chairman, and with great propriety. I observe that I was reported in one of the papers as suggesting that that subject should go to the Committee on Commerce. That suggestion did not come from me. I think the appropriate committee was the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the honorable chairman suggested. But, I repeat, a matter concerning the defenses of the country does not belong to us. I see no reason why the subject of the defenses on the lakes should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations any more than the defenses on the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast; and surely those do not belong to us.

I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will concur in the motion to send this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, the appropriate committee certainly to consider the matter of the defenses of the country. As it regards the reciprocity treaty, that concerns our relations with a foreign country by negotiation, and properly belongs to us, but not so as it regards the defenses of the country. That is a totally different question, and one which should be investigated by another committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was myself somewhat in doubt as to which committee this bill should be referred. My first impression was that it had better go to the Committee on Finance, as it involves the expenditure of a large sum of money; but the truth is, that either one of four committees could properly take jurisdiction of the subject-matter contained in this bill. The Committee on Finance could properly take jurisdiction of it, for there is a large amount of money to be appropriated by it. So could the Committee on Military Affairs, for it concerns the erection of fortifications. So could the Committee on Naval Affairs, because it concerns the building of floating batteries. So, too, in my opinion, the Committee on Foreign Relations could very properly have the subject referred to them, in the existing state of the country and in the existing state of the business of the Senate. Other questions, growing out of our relations to the British provinces of Canada, have been referred to that committee; and what has transpired on the frontier, and the late issuance of an order from the executive department of the Government forbidding any persons coming into the United States from the British provinces without a passport, unless they are immigrants coming to reside in the United States, have raised questions involving our relations with those provinces, and, as a matter of course, as they belong to Great Britain, with Great Britain herself. To either of these committees, I think, this bill could very properly be referred. When I first asked that it should be referred to the Committee on Finance, I looked upon it mainly as an appropriation of money; but as the question of the reciprocity treaty is now pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and as I happen to be a member of that committee, and am not a member of either of those other committees, perhaps it would not be asking too much, on the whole, after what has been said, to ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose it is in a great measure immaterial to whom the inquiry is submitted. Either of the committees suggested (which I am sure would be the case with the whole of the Senate) would at all times be willing to claim the rights and protect the honor of the United States. If these are seriously threatened at the present time, or if there is any well-grounded reason to suppose that they will be assailed hereafter, we should all be at once desirous of placing the United States in a situation to maintain that protection effectually.

I am not at all surprised that the citizens who are upon the border of Canada should be somewhat alive to the manifestations of hostility which from time to time have been made or threatened from that colony. I think, however, it may now be assumed as true that the colonial government itself is very far from justifying the acts of which we have so much reason to complain, and I cannot doubt but that the home Government, when they come to know exactly what is the situation of the colony toward the United States, will be equally desirous of doing all that their determination to observe a strict neutrality imposes as a duty upon them.

If these raids are continued, I think there is no doubt that under the law of nations, if the parties cannot be arrested within the limits of the United States, they may be pursued into the adjoining territory. I believe that right is just as firmly settled as any other question can be settled by the law of nations. It was under the impression that the right existed that the excellent and patriotic soldier, General Dix, issued the order authorizing his officers to pursue these raiders, if they should appear on this side of the border and they should prove unable to capture them on this side of the border, into the limits of Canada; but I see by the papers that the President of the United States, or the Secretary of State, better informed, I suppose, of the disposition of the Canadian government, and better informed as to what in all probability will be the conduct of the home Government, has directed General Dix to rescind that part of his order.

The country was a good deal excited, and naturally excited, by the release of those who made the piratical attack upon St. Albans. That judge apparently—for it is not fair to assume that he acted corruptly—acted honestly in the belief, strange as the opinion may be, that he possessed no jurisdiction over the matter. That that decision was clearly erroneous I was satisfied at the time it was announced to us, and I am now better satisfied, because, as I see, the colonial government and all the officers of the colonial government hold that his decision was altogether erroneous, and they have directed writs to be issued for the rearrest of those parties. Whether that arrest can be made or not is doubtful. In all probability they have made their escape and gone elsewhere. But I cannot but believe that the whole power of the colonial government, and with the sanction of the mother Government, will be exerted to arrest these raids in the future; but still it is proper, perhaps due to ourselves, especially in the peculiar position in which we are, that we should take every possible measure which may be calculated in our opinion to prevent their repetition, or that failing, that will enable us to vindicate ourselves, either within our own limits or within the limits of the contiguous territory; for it can never be tolerated by the United States—it never should be, and I am sure never will be; certainly not by the Senate of the United States—that these inroads should be made upon the limits of the United States, and those acts of piratical warfare, thieving, and murder be carried on with impunity.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the piratical expeditions by land which may be organized and carried out, if things are permitted to go on as they have gone on, on the Canadian frontier would be very disastrous, it is true, to the peace of our citizens and dangerous to their lives and their property; but those little land expeditions that might be organized in Canada along our frontier would be as nothing compared to what might be organized should they be able in the Georgian bay or some of the remote bays around Lake Huron to catch hold of a vessel and put on board of it cannon and all the enginery of war to destroy our cities and towns bordering upon the great lakes. One single vessel seized by those pirates upon the lakes could lay the whole city of Chicago in ashes; and the same is true of the city where I live and the city of Milwaukee, for there is no way in which we could prevent their passage through the straits of Mackinaw, which are two or three miles broad, in deep water, running out into Lake Huron. It is therefore necessary for our safety that we should put it in the power of the Executive to build the floating batteries which may be necessary to defend the straits of Mackinaw and defend the commerce of Lake Michigan as well as the commerce of the other great lakes.

But, Mr. President, I will not enter into a discussion now. I hope for one that the Canadian government and the Canadian authorities are in earnest in their determination to prevent in the future any further hostile or piratical excursions from those provinces into the United States; but if they do not prevent them we all know what the consequence is—it is war. God grant that war may be averted! I hope and trust it may be, and will labor and do all in my power consistent with the honor of the country to prevent it and to save the peace of this Government and to save civilization and the world from the great shock which must follow a war between the United States and Great Britain; but if the terrible necessity, through their negligence or smothered hostility or from any other cause, must come, let it come. We will end the question whenever it does come by perfect free trade between Canada and the United States, and by putting an end to the jurisdiction of Great Britain in any of these provinces in North America. But, sir, I desire no war; far from it. I would do all that can be reasonably done to prevent it, and I believe it can be prevented; but the wise mode in which to prevent ourselves from being involved is to be prepared for any contingencies.

I hope, sir, that the bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. The question before the Senate is simply on the reference of this bill. It is a question of the order of business.

Now, looking at its character, it is plain that it concerns primarily and essentially our foreign relations. It is this circumstance that gives to it a peculiar interest. If it merely concerned an additional levy of troops, or the building of new forts, or a change in our commercial policy, there would have been no question with regard to its reference, nor would the Senator from Wisconsin have accompanied it by any remarks calling attention to the outrage at St. Albans. I assume, then, that it concerns our foreign relations, and, therefore, according to the usages of the Senate, should be referred to the committee having that subject in charge.

This is all that I have to say on the question of reference; but the Senate will pardon me if I glance for one moment at the outrage to which the Senator referred. Only a few weeks ago the village of St. Albans, in Vermont, was disturbed by a band of murderers, highwaymen, house-breakers, horse-thieves, and bank-robbers coming from Canada. After breaking open the banks and obtaining a certain amount of spoils, attended by the murder of a citizen, they succeeded in making their way back to Canada, where they declared themselves to be agents of the rebel government. Such are the main facts. Now, Mr. President, does any one suppose that these agents of the rebel government were moved to their criminal enterprise merely by considerations of plunder—that they risked life and everything merely to rob a bank? No such thing. Their object was much higher and more far-reaching. In one word, it was to embroil the Government of the United States with the Government of Great Britain. I cannot doubt that this was their object. To my mind it is as plain as noonday.

These agents, or rather the men behind who set them on, knew the sensitiveness of our people, and how naturally they would be aroused against the foreign country in which the enterprise had its origin. They saw that excitement, passion, anger on our part were inevitable; that out of these some complication or collision might ensue; that any such complication or collision must necessarily help the rebellion more than a victory on the field of battle. All this they saw, and acted accordingly. The whole proceeding was a trap in which to catch the Government of our country. It was hoped that in this way the rebellion would gain that powerful British intervention which would help restore its failing fortunes.

For myself, sir, I am determined not to be caught in any such trap. There are many things which Great Britain has done since the outbreak of our rebellion which to my mind are most unfriendly; but I am unwilling that anything should be done on our side to furnish any seeming apology for that foreign intervention which has been so constantly menaced, and which was foreshadowed in the most hasty and utterly unjustifiable concession of ocean belligerency to rebel slave-mongers who had but a single port or prize-court. Nobody sees the wrongs we have suffered more clearly than I do; but I see other wrongs also. While never ceasing to claim all our just rights, and reminding this Power always of duties which it has plainly neglected, I cannot forget that we are engaged at this moment in a war for the suppression of a long-continued and most virulent rebellion, which has thus far tasked our best energies. To this work let us now dedicate ourselves, without arousing another enemy, through whose alliance the rebellion may be encouraged and strengthened. Let us put down the rebellion. Do this, and we shall do everything.

Meanwhile I trust that the Senate will not be moved by passion into any hasty action on any of the measures now before it, but that each will be considered carefully and calmly on its merits, according to the usage of this body. This surely is the dictate of prudence, and I cannot doubt that it is the dictate of patriotism also.

Washington in his farewell address warns against "the insidious wiles of foreign influence;" but the "insidious wiles" of our rebels, seeking to embroil us with foreign Powers, are as deadly as any influence now brought against us. Forewarned is forearmed. Let us be steadfast against them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts alludes to only one of the troubles we have had on the border, and that the least significant. He alludes to the march of certain marauders into Vermont, and the capture of banks and the destruction of property there. He probably has forgotten for the moment a much more serious affair that took place almost within my own sight. I happened to be at Toledo at the time of the capture of the Philo Parsons and the Bay City. Senators will remember that an armed band entered on one of our vessels engaged in a peaceful commerce between the city of Detroit and the city of Sandusky, their arms concealed, partly on their bodies and partly in boxes, and when they had got upon the vessel, and the vessel in its usual course had gone into American waters, the arms suddenly appeared, the vessel was seized, was manned, and became at once a vessel of war under the confederate flag. Thus, in the course of a few hours, the confederate flag floated almost within sight of three respectable cities of the State of Ohio.

Another vessel, the Bay City, also engaged in peaceful commerce, was seized on the same day; and these two vessels lay off the harbor of Sandusky, within ten miles of where three thousand rebel officers were held as prisoners of war. They were only guarded by the solitary vessel of war of the United States upon the lakes, the steamer Michigan; and it was a part of the plan of the raiders, marauders, or confederates to seize the steamer Michigan. They had made their arrangements with persons in the city of Sandusky and scattered along the lakes to seize that, the only vessel of war on the lakes. If they had accomplished their object they might have laid under tribute Detroit, Toledo, Sandusky, and Cleveland in twenty-four hours; they might have destroyed a commerce equal at this moment to our entire commerce on the ocean.

I desire the Senator when he considers this subject to remember another fact, that when, for some reason not yet disclosed, this plot failed, and these marauders went back into Canada from whence they came, the authorities there shielded them and discharged them from even an ordinary arrest, and they go this day equipped in Canada, and will be received almost anywhere in Canada with plaudits, while our citizens are watched with jealousy and suspicion.

Is it to be wondered at that the people of the border, when these things have occurred in their midst, should feel anxiety and care? Why, sir, if this plot had succeeded, property to an untold amount would have been destroyed; they might have seized vessel upon vessel. Hundreds of vessels were floating between Buffalo and Detroit at that very time; and if they had succeeded in their plot so far as to capture the steamer Michigan they might have seized fifty or one hundred vessels upon the lakes, and we should have been entirely powerless. There is not an armed vessel on Lake Erie except this steamer Michigan; there is not a gun or a fort or any means of defense along that whole border; and when our Canadian neighbors will thus harbor pirates and desperadoes who seize our vessels in peaceful commerce, trading at their own ports, is it to be wondered at that we on the border should feel the deepest interest in this question?

For ten years our citizens have believed that they have been robbed by what is called the "reciprocity treaty." They know that lands in Canada have more than doubled in value under the operation of the reciprocity treaty. They know that under the peculiar provisions of that treaty the bargain is all on one side. But, as long as we were at peace, we did not care for that. The reciprocity treaty tended to develop our neighbor, tended to bring large colonies into Canada; we had no objection to it. I myself never moved in the matter, although I saw that the effect of that reciprocity treaty was all on one side. But when we find that these people who have been fed by our commerce, who have made money by our trade, will protect these pirates floating upon our common boundaries, then a different feeling springs up, and the people along the border will maintain and defend themselves.

I must express my sincere regret that the order of General Dix, which was in the very language of Mr. Phillimore, one of the best writers on international law, and an English writer, should have been revoked. I believe that the spirit of the order of General Dix is the only way in which we can meet these marauders; and now it is rather the fear of war—I will not say the fear of war, because no proud nation is influenced by that, but it is the fear of the consequences of war and the consequences of pressing this policy in Canada any further than will probably induce the Canadian authorities to respect our rights as a nation, and probably to punish and prevent like instances in the future. But until they show some such spirit, I think that our Government ought to assume and exercise all the rights which, under the laws of nations, we have, to pursue pirates and robbers into any country that harbors them, whether it may be the kingdom of Great Britain or any other country.

I desire also to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to a very significant article here before me, which probably he read two or three years ago, but which may have escaped his recollection. When there was some fear that we should be involved in difficulty with Great Britain on account of the Trent affair, the honorable Senator will remember that an article appeared in the London Times of the date of January 7, 1862, which was semi-official in its character, showing the advantages that Great Britain would have over us in the event of a collision, and among the rest referred to the treaty and arrangement that are now about to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. By the treaty of 1815, it was agreed that the two Powers, Great Britain and the United States, should dismantle their fleets upon the lakes and their forts, and subsequently, by an arrangement made in 1817, not in the form of a treaty, and which was never ratified by the Senate, so far as I can find, a stipulation was made as to the amount of force which should be kept upon the lakes. Under that arrangement we have gone on, we have no vessels of war on the lakes; but on the other hand, while Great Britain has nominally kept this treaty intact, she has substantially enabled herself, by building canals around the falls, to throw upon the lakes within thirty days fifty or a hundred men-of-war; and in this significant article I have before me, it is alluded to that Great Britain can, in case of a conflict with the United States, throw her gunboats from the river Thames right on to the upper lakes, and in thirty days make a more complete blockade of all our ports on the lakes than even now we maintain on the southern coast, and destroy our cities. This article is very significant. It speaks of the power of Canada to build rapidly vessels of war on the lakes, and also of our power to build rapidly vessels on the lakes, but very properly says that we have no means of throwing vessels from the sea into the lakes. We cannot do that, but they can.

With this threat, made at a time when we were in danger of war, staring us in the face, I ask whether it is not the part of prudence and of caution, even dealing with a friendly nation, that we should place ourselves on equal terms. If Great Britain can throw vessels upon the upper lakes in derogation of a treaty which was made to prevent this force of mutual invasion and recrimination, I say we ought to prepare ourselves for the like security; and there is no other preparation that I know of except to give the President full authority and means to place suddenly upon the lakes the necessary force.

I do not anticipate a war with Great Britain. I would dread it. I think no man ought to say anything that would contribute to the hostile feeling between this country and Great Britain. When Great Britain and the United States fight with each other, as they may in the course of the future, though I trust not, it will be a battle of giants. We have shown by our power in this war our ability to carry on war fearfully and with great physical strength; and when we come to fight England again, if in the course of Providence we ever do, it will not be a fight such as the war of 1812, or the war of the Revolution; but it will be a fight between the two greatest physical Powers of the globe, with the single exception, probably, of France. Such a war ought to be avoided, and no man in public life ought to say anything that would excite feelings of hostility between these two great nations speaking the same language; but yet it is a mark of prudence, it is a mark of caution, to prepare ourselves for this exigency; and therefore I think there is nothing that will go before the Committee on Foreign Relations which will be more important, or which ought to demand more careful consideration, than the question raised by the reference now moved by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator please read the article to which he has alluded?

Mr. SHERMAN. The article is a long one, but for the purpose of recalling it to the memory of Senators, I will read it. It is, as I have said, from the London Times of January 7, 1862.

"THE NAVAL RE-ENFORCEMENTS FOR NORTH AMERICA.—If praise is due to the War Department for their rapid and energetic action in sending out military stores and reinforcements for Canada, the same tribute can unquestionably be claimed by the Admiralty for the rapidity which they have shown in preparing for the impending struggle, strengthening our fleet on the North American station, and bringing forward the vessels that will be fit for service on the lakes of Canada. It is just five weeks since we laid before our readers a list of the naval force, under the command of Admiral Milne, on the North American and West India stations. That list comprised five line-of-battle ships, ten first-class frigates, and seventeen powerfully armed corvettes and sloops, all steamers, and mounting in all eighty-five guns. This fleet is, in fact, equal to the whole Federal Navy, whether steam or sailing. As we have said, only five weeks have elapsed since that list was given, and already the preparations are far advanced toward reinforcing this fleet with two line-of-battle ships, twenty-three of the largest, fastest, and heaviest screw frigates, and eight powerful corvettes, mounting among them one thousand guns. Some of these vessels have sailed, and are already on the station, others are on their way out, others only await their sailing orders to start at a moment's notice; some are in commission and will be ready and off in a very short time, and only one or two, such as the Black Prince, though rapidly fitting, are not sufficiently forward to be commissioned yet.

"Of the squadron of frigates, each vessel has been carefully chosen for its great sailing speed, high steam power, and heavy armament, and never yet has such a fleet of picked cruisers been sent against any enemy. Among them are the Shannon, 51 guns; Leander, 51; the Euryalus, 51; Sutley, 51; Orlando, 51; Severn, 51; Phoebe, 51; Warrior, 40; Black Prince, 40; Galatea, 28, (sister to the formidable Ariadne); Defiance, 22; Defense, (iron), 22; Resistance, (iron), 22; Satellite, 21; Orpheus, 21; Barrosa, 21; Pyriades, 21; Rattlesnake, 21; Chanticleer, 17; Greyhound, 17; Zebra, 17; and Magicienne, 16. The two line-of-battle ships are the Hero, 91 guns, and the Meenae, 81. The sloops, very heavily armed, are the Styx, 7 guns; Stromboli, 7; Devastation, 7; Petrel, 11; Rapid, 11; Rosario, 11; Pandora, 5; and Vigilant, 4. All these ships, like those already on the stations, are screws or paddles, so that by the beginning of February, Admiral Milne will have at his disposal sixty-five sail—namely, seven line-of-battle ships, thirty-three frigates, and twenty-five corvettes and sloops. Of the seven line-of-battle ships, four—the St. George, Conqueror, Donagel, and Hero—both steam and sail as fast as the best frigates in the service. With such a force a total and most effective blockade of all the Federal ports could be established in a single week; for, unlike the coast line of the confederate States, which is protected by myriads of little islands, and countless inlets and channels leading to the great rivers beyond, all the great Federal harbors have such narrow entrances that a single vessel would be sufficient to stop all passage in or out. With the Warrior at Sandy Hook, what could enter New York, or rather what effectual resistance could Fort Hamilton and the batteries on Staten Island offer to a combined attack of the four iron frigates, in case the Government wished to force the passage, and dictate their own terms of peace by laying the fleet broadside on to the streets of New York and Hoboken? That the Warrior and Black Prince, Resistance and Defense, could engage and destroy these batteries without the smallest risk to themselves, the experiments against the Warrior target have proved conclusively. A single vessel at each port closes Boston and Portland, and two off Cape May would be ample for the Delaware river and the trade of Philadelphia. Admiral Milne, we believe, has already made very complete arrangements as to the disposition of his squadron, so that, in the event of war, the Federal cruisers off the southern coast may be promptly and satisfactorily accounted for.

"The worst part of the struggle, however, will not be on the north Atlantic seaboard, but on the great lakes of Upper Canada and North America. It was said truly in the last war that whoever was master of these lakes would be the master of all. The knowledge of this may have led to the clause in the treaty of 1815, by which both Powers agreed to build no war vessels on the lakes in time of peace, and this clause again accounts for the fact that the New Orleans, eighty-four guns, commenced in 1814 in Sackett's Harbor, on Lake Ontario, has remained unfinished to this day. Of course, from this vessel, left unfinished nearly fifty years ago, (though it is to this hour reckoned in the Federal Navy List as an effective line-of-battle ship,) we have nothing to fear. It is, however, most important to remember that the Federals have a navy-yard on Lake Ontario, and that, to avert the ravages of war from Upper Canada, we must be careful to maintain as absolute a supremacy on Lakes Erie and Ontario as we shall do on the American coast, from the Bay of Fundy to the Chesapeake. This, as concerns our success in the struggle, is a point of vital interest, and we are glad, therefore, to be able to tell our readers that this danger has been foreseen and amply provided against, and that within a week after the breaking up of the ice in the rivers and canals a whole fleet of gunboats, with the most powerful of the screw corvettes sent out to Admiral Milne, will carry the protection of the English flag from Montreal to Detroit.

"Between Lake Ontario and Montreal the navigation of the St. Lawrence is rendered difficult and somewhat dangerous to vessels coming down the stream by the rapids of Long Sault, the Cedars, Cascades, and Lachine, places where there are sudden rapids formed by a series of declivities in the bed of the river, and where the waters rush down, sometimes for a distance of one or two miles, with a velocity of from twenty to nearly twenty-five miles an hour. Until within the last few years these rapids were considered too dangerous for any vessel to attempt to descend them, and, of course, getting up them again is impossible. To overcome the obstacles which these currents offered to water communication by the great highway of the St. Lawrence to the lakes above, the Canadian government, with British assistance, have formed a series of canals with innumerable lock-gates above Montreal, by which the rapids are avoided, and easy communication obtained with Lakes Ontario, Erie, and Michigan. The first canal is about two miles long, through the southern extremity of the island of Montreal, and this avoids the rapids of Lachine. The next, in order to avoid the Cascades and Cedars rapids, is much longer, and, unfortunately, it is made on the right or American bank of the river, and only some twelve or fifteen miles distance from the frontier itself. This extends from Beauharnais to Hungry bay, and is called the Beauharnais canal. The next, the Cornwall canal, extends from Cornwall to Dickensons's landing, to avoid the Long Sault. Beyond this are short detached canals at Farrand's Point, the Platte, Iroquois, and Galops rapids. After these the navigation is clear through the Thousand Islands into Lake Ontario. The tall, wide, three-storied river steamers which ply between Ontario and Montreal go up these canals every day; and up these canals, too, the gunboats, sloops, and corvettes must pass to protect the shores and trade of Western Canada. They may do so with ease, since all the locks in these canals are built to pass vessels one hundred and eighty-six feet long, forty-four and a half feet beam, and nine feet draught.

"On this important point we can speak with certainty, as we have an official engineer's plan, with the dimensions of the locks and canals, before us. All our smaller twenty-one-gun frigates, such as the Pyriades, Rattlesnake, Barrosa, Satellite, &c., could, we think, with perfect ease pass up these locks, if lightened of their heavy stores and armaments, which could, of course, be taken up with them on timber rafts, or flat-bottomed country boats. Once on the waters of Lake Ontario, all our difficulties would be at an end, for at the western extremity of Lake Ontario is the Welland canal, connecting Port Dalhousie, on Lake Ontario, with Port Colborne, on Lake Erie. The length of this canal is about thirty-five miles, and it passes entirely through British territory. The lock-gates on this are capable of passing vessels of one hundred and forty-two feet long, twenty-six feet beam, and ten feet draught, an ample accommodation for the heavy-armed six-gun screw dispatch gunboat vessels like the Flying Fish, or even for the heavy-armed eleven-gun sloops of the class to which the Rapid, Petrel, and Rosario belong. From Lake Erie the River St. Clair leads direct between Detroit, on the American side, and Chatham, on the Canadian side, into Lake Michigan. Across Lake St. Clair and down the St. Clair river two thirds of the corn and provision traffic between the States of the far West and the Atlantic seaboard is carried on, and one or two corvettes on Lake St. Clair would be sufficient to stop it all. The Grand Trunk railway has a line to the settlement of Sarnia, on Lake Huron, around the shores of which grows any quantity of the finest timber. If shipwrights were employed to build a few gunboats at this place, (their machinery and armaments could be forwarded by rail,) they could steam at once, by a passage as wide as the straits of Dover, into Lake Michigan, and find not only the enormous traffic of this great lake, but even such towns as Chicago and Milwaukee, entirely at their mercy. It may be said, perhaps, that in case of war it is equally open to the Federalists to do all this as to ourselves; but this is not so. Undoubtedly, if we built gunboats on Lake Huron, the Federals could build others to check them on Lakes Michigan and Superior quite as fast. But it is equally certain that they cannot possibly build steam frigates and corvettes on Lakes Erie and Ontario as fast as we can send them up through the canals we have mentioned ready-built, manned, and equipped. There is, moreover, only one practicable means of communication between Ontario and Erie, which is through the Welland canal we have spoken of, held by the British. As soon as the ice breaks, therefore, if the war goes on, we may expect to find these lakes covered with cruisers, and each Federal port on them as closely blockaded as Boston and New York.

"It must not be supposed, however, that the Federals will quietly acquiesce in our supremacy. In the time that would intervene between the declaration of war and the thawing of the canals on the St. Lawrence, the Federals would be masters of the situation, and would be certain to fit out something like the mosquito fleet that swarmed over the West India station when the 'sensation' as to the slaver right of search ran high. Such vessels, however ridiculous when opposed to steam frigates, would be very formidable when there was nothing to resist them, and we cannot meet them in the lakes before next April. Kingston, with its Fort Henry and some still more formidable batteries, a fleur d'eau, can take care of itself, and a couple of guns on the long spit of land which shuts in the splendid harbor of Hamilton would well shield that fine town. But Whitby, Coburg, Delville, even Toronto itself, might be laid in ashes by a couple of ferry-boats carrying long-range guns, if immediate steps are not taken to defend them with earth-works when it is first seen that war is inevitable. However, as the Canadian government have direct telegraphic communication with Lord Lyons at Washington, we may trust they are not likely to be taken by surprise on this point.

"But there are other means of carrying the war into the enemy's territory besides by the Welland and St. Lawrence canals. Lake Ontario can be reached from Montreal by the Ottawa and Rideau canal. This is the longest in Canada or America, about one hundred and twenty miles in length, running from Ottawa to Kingston. The locks on this accommodate vessels of one hundred feet length, nineteen feet beam, and five and a half feet draught, so that by this route our gunboats might gain Ontario and Erie, while the corvettes and short frigates came up by the St. Lawrence. At Sorel, also, about twenty miles below Montreal, is a river which leads through the St. Ours lock and through the Chambly canal direct on to the head of Lake Champlain. The locks on this canal admit ships of one hundred and thirteen feet length, twenty-two and a half feet beam, and six and a half feet draught—so that by this route also any number of gunboats might be sent into Lake Champlain, on the waters of which there is not a single vessel larger than a steam ferry, and on the shores of which are large, rich, and utterly unprotected towns, such as Burlington, New Haven, &c. All these canals are British property, on British soil, and held by the Canadian government as the keys which give access to our ships to the most distant provinces of the West. In our previous notice of the military reinforcements for Canada we omitted, in speaking of the high efficiency of the military train, to mention the name of Colonel McMurdo, to whom, as having been intrusted with its organization from the commencement until very recently, so much praise is most justly due."

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there are two additional topics which the Senator from Ohio has introduced into the discussion on which I wish to make a single remark, not by way of argument, not even to express any difference from that Senator. He has called attention to the recent order of General Dix, and has averred that it is supported by the eminent authority of Mr. Phillimore, the latest English writer on the law of nations. The words of Mr. Phillimore have been quoted in the Canadian press and also in some of the newspapers of our country. They do seem to sanction the order of General Dix. But perhaps the Senator from Ohio has not had his attention called to another authority of our own country which is in a different sense. I refer to the recent work of General Halleck on the law of nations, which, take it all in all, is perhaps the best practical manual on that subject extant. If Senators refer to that, they will see that this writer, after quoting the very words of Mr. Phillimore, takes exception to them as too broad, and doubts whether any enterprise in pursuance of that authority would be sustained by the law of nations. In short, he says that anything done in that sense would be an act of war.

Now, sir, I do not intend myself on this occasion to express any opinion on that question. There is no occasion for it.

Mr. HOWARD. Will my honorable friend from Massachusetts have the goodness, if the book of General Halleck is at hand, to read the passage to which he refers? It is certainly a very important principle that General Halleck announces.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator knows very well that the debate has come up to-day accidentally; I have not the book of General Halleck here. I dare say it is in the Congressional Library, and I can have it within a reasonable time, and I shall have great pleasure in calling the attention of the Senator to the passage and section on this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me for asking if General Halleck cites any authority for the opinion?

Mr. SUMNER. I think he does not; I think he goes into a criticism of the English authority. Mr. JOHNSON. He is clearly wrong.

Mr. SUMNER. As I say, I do not wish now to be drawn into any opinion on the question; I merely call attention to the difference of opinion among important authorities, and I show that while the Englishman would seem to sustain General Dix, the American authority does not sustain him; that is all.

There is one other topic to which the Senator from Ohio referred, and that is the naval forces on the lakes. He is aware that the "arrangement" on that subject is anomalous, abnormal in its character; that it does not appear to have ever received the sanction of the Senate; that in the statute-book it is only printed in small type; it is a small type arrangement; that it does seem to have been proclaimed at the time by the President; but the origin, and history, and character of that arrangement are still subjects of doubt. It was on this account that only the other day I introduced a resolution into the Senate calling for all information on the files of the Department of State with reference to that anomalous paper, as it may be characterized. When that information is received, the Senate will then have the proper information to proceed, as they should, to annul it. I have no doubt that they will act promptly as soon as ever they are in a condition to act at all.

Mr. GRIMES. There is one subject that has been introduced into this debate to which I desire to direct the special attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations when this question shall be referred to them, and that is as to the truth of the allegations set forth in the editorial of the London Times. In the language which has been quoted by the Senator from Ohio, the article says:

"But it is equally certain that they [the United States] cannot possibly build steam frigates and corvettes on Lakes Erie and Ontario as fast as we can send them up through the canals we have mentioned, ready built, manned, and equipped."

Now, I assert that Great Britain has not got a corvette, or a sloop, or any steam vessel of war that has the capacity to go through the canals into the upper lakes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Iowa will allow me to read an extract from that same editorial he will find that it gives information on that very point. It speaks of the Welland canal connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario, which is the smallest of the canals, and says of it:

"The length of this canal is about thirty-five miles, and it passes entirely through British territory. The lock-gates on this are capable of passing vessels of one hundred and forty-two feet long, twenty-six feet beam, and ten feet draught—an ample accommodation for the heavy-armed six-gun screw dispatch gunboat vessels like the Flying Fish, or even for the heavy-armed eleven-gun sloops of the class to which the Rapid, Petrel, and Rosario belong."

Thus the writer gives the size of the locks of the canal and designates the class of vessels that can pass through those locks, and quite a number of vessels are named as those that could go through into the upper lakes.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the writer goes on and speaks about the capacity of the British to send through frigates and corvettes. Everybody knows that they cannot send those through; and everybody who is familiar with the British navy knows that the class of gunboats they built during the Crimean war and which had capacity to go through these canals, have now been entirely broken up and destroyed. I remember having had my attention called to this matter when the project of building a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Mississippi was under consideration, and it was urged in the section of the country in which I reside that it was necessary that we should expend millions of dollars to build a ship canal in order that we might have in that counterpoise for the power which Great Britain had in her canals; and my attention having been thus directed to it, I satisfied my own mind that Great Britain had not the power to molest us in this way.

The true mode, Mr. President, to defend ourselves on the northern frontier and on the lakes is to have arsenals and armories there. On the lakes we have ten tons of shipping where the British have one; we own nearly all the steamboats that ply there, and we shall continue to own them so long as we maintain our present navigation laws, giving to our own people the power to transport the traffic of that country. All you want, whenever difficulties shall occur between us and Great Britain, is to have armaments which you can immediately throw on board these vessels. Take possession of the mouth of the Welland canal, and what power will the British have? Where the necessity, therefore, of deciding in advance that we must go and build fortifications at the mouth of every river, or near every harbor on the whole upper lakes?

Mr. President, the true way to settle this whole thing is to repeal the reciprocity treaty. Great Britain is not going to fight for Canada. Canada was an apple ripe and ready to drop into our hands when the reciprocity treaty was agreed to. It was consummated through the instrumentality of the men who are now in rebellion against this Government, with a little aid that was furnished to them by the people of the North. Repeal the reciprocity treaty and you will find that in less than twenty-four months the people of the Canadas and of the British provinces generally to the north and northeast of us will be clamorous to come back to us. I trust that the Committee on Foreign Relations will direct their attention specially to that branch of the subject that is committed to them.

Mr. SUMNER. The committee meet to-morrow expressly to consider that.

Mr. GRIMES. I am glad to hear it, and I hope we shall have speedy action on that matter. Sir, the newspapers tell us that there is a panic in Canada. I have no doubt of it. It does not proceed from any fear that they have of war; it proceeds from the fear that they have of their pockets. The moment you repeal the reciprocity treaty, that moment the stock of every railroad in all Canada will become utterly worthless; every man of wealth and means there will become bankrupt. It is caused by the fear they have of the repeal of that treaty which gives them the carrying trade of the produce from the West, and gives them the power to compete with us in the eastern markets, which is very much to our injury.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, before this proposition goes to any committee, I want to avail myself of the occasion to make two, possibly three remarks, if I do not forget the third.

The first is that I am glad at last to see attention called, for some reason or by any means, to the defenseless condition of our northern lakes. It is said that there is a panic in Canada. I hope there is no panic here to prevent our considering the subject coolly and calmly, and with a tolerable share of wisdom. When the first fortification bill that ever I heard considered in the Senate was under consideration here, in the winter of 1862, I then took occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the very condition of things which we hear spoken of to-day, and I then called the attention of the Senate to the very article which the Senator from Ohio has read this morning. It seemed to be then the general opinion of the Senate and of the country that the Northwest was all oak, and could stand alone, and therefore no provision whatever was made for our protection or our defense. It seems to be now admitted that a hostile fleet thrown in on those lakes could operate disastrously on other portions of the country than the Northwest itself; and it is of national importance, it seems to be conceded this morning, that there should be some protection to that section of the country. That is all I have to say upon that head.

The next suggestion I want to make is by way of reminder to the Senate that for the last two years you have had almost the whole country here knocking at the doors of the Legislature and begging you to make an appropriation (and I believe they have never asked for more than one third of the appropriation which is contemplated by this bill) in order to provide an avenue through which you can throw gunboats from the Hudson river into the lakes as readily and as promptly as they can be thrown by way of the St. Lawrence canals. Those calls have not been heeded. My deliberate judgment is that that is the cheapest mode of defending the northern lakes and the countries adjacent thereto. When you have such an avenue open, you will not have to keep useless fortifications or useless fleets there.

The third remark I wish to make is that I do not believe with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] that the repeal of the reciprocity treaty will afford ample protection either to the States adjacent to the great lakes or to any other portion of the country. If it is to be conceded that the repeal of the reciprocity treaty must be had, if that is a foregone conclusion, which I shall regret very much to know as a single individual, I trust no one will be persuaded either by the Senator from Iowa, or in any other way, to rest with the repeal of that treaty. I think other measures will be just as necessary for our protection after that is repealed as before. The repeal of a treaty which it is said has proved beneficial to these provinces, our neighbors, I do not think will make them any more friendly to us. If I believed that that treaty was more beneficial to them than to us I should say that of itself was a good reason for the repeal of the treaty; but the repeal of the treaty is no reason why these other measures of defense should not be prosecuted.

Mr. HALE. I rise, Mr. President, to say a word in regard to a matter which has incidentally been brought in. I entirely agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] in regard to the reciprocity treaty, and I wish to make one or two suggestions to the Senate on that subject. I think that at the last session an attempt was made very perseveringly, and I may say obstinately, to repeal the fishing bounties. It was resisted in this body, and successfully resisted, on the ground that those bounties were necessary in order to encourage the fisheries as a school for seamen. Now, sir, the reciprocity treaty encourages the fisheries of our northeastern States ten times what all your fishing bounties do, and I hope that the representatives in the Senate from those States will see what it is before they consent to its repeal. The very first article in the treaty, and one of the most important, is in these words:

"It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, in addition to the liberties secured to the United States fishermen by the above-mentioned convention of October 20, 1813, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea-coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the coasts and shores of those colonies and the islands thereof, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish."

This is one of the most important privileges ever secured to the fishing interest of this country, and the Senator from Maine before me [Mr. FARWELL] knows it as well as I do. I was recently in the office of the American consul at Halifax, and I think I speak within bounds when I say that of the American captains who called there for the purpose of exhibiting their manifests and making their entries, more than nineteen twentieths of all the commerce that was thus officially registered at the office of the American consul at Halifax consisted of fish. It is a very important item, and it was an item that was placed first in consideration in the treaty.

Again, sir, another provision should be borne in mind in view of the present high price of coal, which is an article of prime necessity for the people of this country, and especially for the poor people. That article, under this treaty, comes into the United States free of duty; and anybody who is acquainted with the necessity that humanity itself demands in the matter of fuel in the cities and on the northeastern coast will be slow, I think, before consenting to repeal a treaty which has so beneficent a provision in it as that which allows coal to come in free of duty. This treaty gives us coal, and gives our fishermen a privilege which they never had before, and I should look upon it as one of the most unwise measures this nation could possibly adopt, if we were to repeal the reciprocity treaty for the purpose of inflicting any injury upon the British colonies. The fact is we shall injure ourselves ten times more than we shall the inhabitants of those provinces by repealing the reciprocity treaty. I hope that whatever else we may do, we shall not, in any fancied feeling of wrong that we have suffered at the hands of those colonies, undertake to repeal so beneficent a measure for ourselves as is the reciprocity treaty. It may in some cases, in some localities, and in regard to some interests, have operated disadvantageously; I do not doubt that it has, because that seems to be the judgment of some gentlemen; but in a great national point of view, and particularly with reference to that great national consideration, the nurture of seamen, the privilege that this treaty gives to the fishermen of the United States of fishing within three miles of the British coasts and going upon British territory to cure their fish, is a privilege that I think Massachusetts and Maine will deliberate a very long time before they will consent to give up.

Now, Mr. President, while I am up I want to say another word in regard to the matter of this bill. I do not care much to what committee it may be referred, but I do hope that the Senate will consider, and consider maturely, the condition of things; and that because we are smarting under the unjust decision of a British magistrate in a matter in regard to which the public mind has been exceedingly excited, we will not, under a temporary irritation for this cause, enter upon a system of hasty legislation, one that will be calculated to excite rather than to allay the animosities of these contiguous peoples.

Sir, I believe to-day that the sentiment of the authorities in the British provinces is for discharging their duty in regard to this country. I know that in some parts of the provinces the feeling among the people is different; and I can explain something of what makes it so. Go into Halifax, for instance, which is the great depot for blockade runners at the present time, where they load their vessels to go to Bermuda and Nassau, and then take the chance of running them into Wilmington. At Halifax they get their supplies of groceries, meat, and everything of that sort. The consequence has been to raise the market price of those articles in the British ports; and those who deal in them, and find the prices of them raised, necessarily have their sympathies and their feelings enlisted on the side that puts money in their pockets, more than on the other side. But that there is any settled feeling of hostility to this country among those who control the provincial governments, or control public sentiment there, I do not believe.

I regret as much as anybody the things that have occurred; I feel as indignant as anybody, and I have felt so for a long time; but I think the time has gone by for us to get angry without reason. The time was when we could have got mad with grace and dignity, and it was when the insolent demand was made by Great Britain upon us, in an insolent manner, for the surrender of Mason and Slidell. Then we could have stood before heaven and earth, and we ought to have stood there. That was my opinion then, it is my opinion now. Great Britain demanded the surrender of Mason and Slidell, and in the same breath in which she made the demand she sent her troops in a threatening aspect into her provinces here, ready to back up by force of arms the demand which she had made. My honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] made on that occasion, as he always makes, a very able speech on that subject; and it was my intention, in my poor way and with such feeble suggestions as I could make, to suggest the fallacy and the infirmity of the argument which he submitted to the Senate. But, sir, I did not want, even by implication, to do anything which should add fuel to the flames that seemed to be threatening a general conflagration. Let me tell the Senator here now, however, though I have not read his speech, I am sorry to say, since it was delivered, that Great Britain had been in the habit of doing the very same thing year after year and year after year. She had met American vessels sailing under the American flag, and claimed the right to stop them and to take anybody that the captain of the British cruiser judged to be an English subject from under the protection of our flag and transfer him to theirs. The Senator says "that is true," that is what they had done. The infirmity of his argument was this, that when Great Britain came to have that very same thing practiced on her, then she would not submit; then it was another bull that had gored the ox, and she was prepared to examine the question, and if, and if, and if, and so on. Now, sir, what was it?

The whole matter was that Great Britain had practiced upon one interpretation of national law when her cruisers took her alleged subjects out of our vessels, and when our vessels undertook to apply the same rule, to take men that owed allegiance to this country and were in rebellion against it out of her vessels, she assumed another and a totally different policy, and the Senator from Massachusetts construed that as an abandonment of the piratical doctrine that she had lived upon for so many years before. He will excuse me (for nobody has more respect for him than I have) when I say that that is an answer to his whole speech, beautiful as it was, though it may be presumptuous for me to suppose that an off-hand utterance of mine can answer so elaborate an argument as that; but it is there, sir. We ought to have resisted that, and we ought to have resisted it the more for the insolent and the threatening manner in which it was made. If we had stood up then we should have had the sympathies of the civilized world with us, because we should have then said "we will not submit to have a rule one way for you and another way for us."

Mr. President, let no man say anything lightly that will have a tendency to provoke a war between these two great countries; let no man and no body of men do anything lightly that shall have a tendency to disturb the relations of peace between this country and Great Britain. I should look upon it as one of the greatest calamities that could befall the civilized world. But, sir, we are now at war, we are in the desperate contingencies of national life or death, and I say that if national life cannot be preserved with national honor, then come national death; the loss of national honor can never be retrieved. I say, therefore, we should not hastily, even by any words of debate, say anything which shall have a tendency to excite such a feeling and to provoke such a result.

Mr. President, I believe that by wise counsels, and by prudent and by firm counsels, we can do everything that the emergencies of the time require. I rejoice to notice in the papers which have come to hand since the order of General Dix was made, and before the order of the President countermanning it, that the tone of the leading presses in the provinces, in Canada especially, was one of justification of General Dix's order. They did not feel that it was an infringement upon the dignity or the power of Great Britain, but, so far as I have seen, and I have seen numbers of them, the tone of the press in the Canadas was almost universal in sustaining the position which General Dix had taken. The President thought differently, and I am content with that.

But, sir, while we would do nothing rashly, and while I would counsel nothing rashly, I would counsel firmness; and I confess I regret (though upon the whole I agree with the general tenor of the letter) that our minister at Brazil, in the communication which he made touching the seizure of the vessel Florida by our cruiser, admits so boldly and so baldly as he does that we had submitted to wrong and insolence from Great Britain because we were not in a situation to resist it. It may possibly be true; but if it be true, it should have been kept in the most secret recesses of the patriotic heart, and never should have been uttered until we were in a situation to enforce that which we believed to be our right.

Now, Mr. President, I have said thus much because I have totally disagreed with those who would repeal this reciprocity treaty. I think it is a great measure of good, not only to the comfort but to the military ability and to the naval force of the country. Now, when everybody feels aggrieved, when everybody feels that we have been treated by the subordinates of the Canadian government as no independent nation should submit to be treated, I hope that in such an hour and such a time as this, while we take counsel of that patriotic indignation which burns in every American breast at this great outrage, we will still take counsel of prudence as well as firmness. I believe that this feeling of indignation at the treatment we have received from Canada, although unofficial, is not confined to this country; I believe it is the universal expression of the public mind of the best classes and of the leading classes in the Canadas; and I hope, to say the least, that this Government, or the Senate, or any official of this Government, will not commit itself to any action until we have heard from the imperial Government and seen what they say on the other side of the water in regard to the wrong that have been inflicted upon us. Let us not do what our minister at Brazil complains that Great Britain did. He complains that when the rebellion broke out, before our minister had been received, before there had been an opportunity to say a word from this Government in regard to the state of things, in hot haste, as soon as the war commenced, Great Britain acknowledged the rebels as belligerents. Well, sir, it was a great wrong, it was a great outrage; but let us not do what amounts to the same thing in a similar case. Let us not put ourselves in any position that can be construed as offensive to Great Britain, until we know how Great Britain herself looks upon the transaction of which we complain.

Mr. FARWELL. I did not propose to take any part in this discussion; but as the Senator from New Hampshire has called upon me, I will state for the information of that Senator and of the Senate that my impression is that the fishermen of New England would be very well content to have the reciprocity treaty repealed. To be sure, the reciprocity treaty gives them some privileges which were denied them under former treaties; for instance, the privilege of fishing within three miles of the coast of the provinces; but, upon the other hand, the duty on salt which our fishermen have to pay is at this time very heavy. Salt costs on board fishing vessels this year one dollar a bushel. Then they are obliged to go on the coast of the provinces to get their fares of fish, with considerable loss of time and expense. The provincial fishermen put their salt on board at about one third the cost of ours; they go out from their own harbors right upon the coast and catch their fares of fish; they bring them duty free into our market to compete with our fishermen. Therefore I think that our fishermen would be the last men to complain of the repeal of the reciprocity treaty.

I was content with the reference of this question to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I wish to say here that I have great admiration for the manner in which the foreign relations of this country have been managed, both by the executive department and by the two Houses of Congress. If by any forbearance short of the loss of national honor we can prevent at this time any collision or any complication of our affairs with foreign countries, it is not good policy to bring about any such collision or complication.

This discussion has taken a wide range, and I propose now to allude to one or two things which have occurred here without any remark from me. A resolution of inquiry was presented last week in regard to making a list of vessels destroyed by the pirates which have been fitted out from England, and calling upon England to pay us for those vessels. The people of my State are very much interested in that subject. We have had a good many vessels destroyed by these pirates, and I hope the time will come when England will pay every dollar of the value of our vessels destroyed; but I would not advise the making of a claim directly on England for the payment of those vessels at the present time. If the Government should collect the money, to whom would it be paid? To whom does it belong? As a general thing the vessels that have been destroyed were insured. The insurance companies have paid for them.

The insurance companies have collected the money in the shape of war premiums from the whole commerce of the country. It is, therefore, a loss to the commerce of the country, and not to the men who have individually lost the vessels or to the insurance companies which have paid for them; but there may be cases of individual hardship, where Congress may think proper to grant relief. I hope to see this money collected in another way. I have noticed a movement in the other House for the repeal of that clause of the Constitution which prohibits the laying of an export duty, and I hope the prohibition may be repealed. More than forty years ago cotton was proclaimed king in this country, and it was king; but now, like another king that we read of, it is driven out to eat grass for a season. But, sir, it will be king again, it will be crowned again as king, and this country is to rule the king that will rule the world; and, sir, when this vast southern country shall be opened, and when free labor shall go down and occupy it, when cotton can be produced for eight or nine cents a pound, and laid down in our harbors ready for export, then it will be for the interest of the men who raise the cotton, and the interest of this whole country, to put an export duty of at least five cents a pound upon cotton. Then, sir, instead of England controlling the market for cotton by taking the great bulk of the crop, the manufacturing interest both North and South will spring up, and at least half the crop will be manufactured at home, and the price will not be exclusively in the control of British merchants and British manufacturers, where with cheap money they hoard up their millions of bales and hold them in order to govern the price. Sir, I trust that all our vessels which have been destroyed will be paid for, together with a large amount of the interest of our debt, by an export duty upon cotton.

But, sir, if there shall be war between England and this country, it will be a war upon the ocean, and I wish here to say one word to Senators upon this topic. The legislation of the last two years has been extremely cruel to our commerce. Hemp, iron, copper, everything that goes into the construction of ships is highly taxed, and then there is a special tax laid upon the construction, a tonnage duty laid every time a vessel comes into port; and further, Congress has required every man who owns a ship which has been once measured and registered by the Government to go on at a large expense and have her remeasured for the pleasure of the Government, or for their accommodation, or for some other purpose, unasked for by the commercial men of the country. The result has been, with the war premiums which we are obliged to pay not only on the hull but practically upon every cargo carried, for no merchant will ship his goods in an American bottom unless he gets the freight enough cheaper to cover the extra war premium on the cargo—the result practically is that we are unfitting ourselves for a war with England; we are driving commerce from the country; our shipping is being sold every day to foreigners, and what is not being sold is being denationalized by a transfer to a foreigner and a foreign flag hoisted over it.

Senators will see by looking at the report of the Secretary of the Navy that we have now fifty one thousand sailors in our Navy, and I think there can be but very few more than that now engaged in the commercial marine of the country. Nearly half of all the sailors are taken from the commercial marine and transferred to the Navy. Then, besides all the other obstacles in the way of the commercial marine of the country, is the great advance in wages caused by the high bounties and the large inducements offered for men to go into the Navy. I trust that the committee who are to have this subject under consideration will as far as possible endeavor to relieve the commerce of the country from all charges which are not paid by foreigners with whom we have to compete. I would, however, assure our friends at the West that they need not be alarmed in the event of a rupture with England. At the first speck of war, with our superior land force to any she can put on foot on this continent, we should take possession of the ingress to the lakes, and with our commercial marine, our steamers so easily converted into war vessels, we should have entire control of the lakes.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] asked me to read to the Senate the important words of General Halleck to which I referred in debate. I told him that I had not the book then with me. Since then I have sent to the Congressional Library, and I now have it before me. I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the Senate, but perhaps it would not be uninteresting to Senators to hear the precise statement of this learned authority on the question which is now one of practical interest to the whole country. General Halleck begins on page 94 by citing the words of Mr. Phillimore, the English authority, as follows:

"A rebellion, or a civil commotion, it may happen, agitates a nation; while the authorities are engaged in repressing it, bands of rebels pass the frontier, shelter themselves under the protection of the contiguous State, and from thence, with restored strength and fresh appliances, renew their invasions upon the State from which they have escaped. The invaded State remonstrates. The remonstrance, whether from favor to the rebels, or feebleness of the Executive, is unheeded, or, at least, the evil complained of remains undressed. In this state of things the invaded State is warranted by international law in crossing the frontier, and in taking the necessary means for her safety, whether these be the capture or dispersion of the rebels, or the destruction of their stronghold, as the exigencies of the case may fairly require."

These are the words of the English authority, already referred to by the Senator from Ohio, quoted by General Halleck. He then proceeds:

"This is certainly a very extraordinary pretension; let us examine the reasons by which it has been attempted to sustain this right of extra-territorial jurisdiction. (Phillimore, On Int. Law, vol. 1, § 213; Phillimore, letter to Lord Ashburton, p. 27, et seq.)

"Mr. Phillimore has himself pointed out what he conceives to be the principle of international law, from which he derives this pretended right of one State to transgress the borders of its neighbor's territory in time of peace, not as an act of hostility, but as a kind of pacifico-belligerent right of territorial violability; pacific with respect to the State whose territory is invaded, and belligerent with respect to the particular powers and places attacked or destroyed."

He then proceeds to quote some other words from Mr. Phillimore, and goes on as follows:

"The defect of Mr. Phillimore's argument consists in the assumption of a false principle for its basis, and his erroneous premises necessarily lead him to an erroneous conclusion. There can be no conflict of rights, stricti juris, between States in time of peace. No such principle is admitted in the code of public international law. It is a maxim of that law that every right is followed by corresponding duties and obligations. If, therefore, one State has a right to violate the territory of a neighbor in time of peace, for what it sees fit to consider the purposes of self-defense, that neighbor is bound to permit its territory to be so violated as often as the other party may conceive that the necessity exists. But it is an established principle that every sovereign State has a right to protect the inviolability of its territory, and that any invasion of it is an act of hostility which may be repelled by force. So, the other party may also enforce, with arms, if need be, its own right of territorial transgression, incident to its paramount right of self-defense! Here, then, we have force repelling force in the pacific exercise of established public international rights! This is the legitimate and necessary consequence of Mr. Phillimore's argument. Its defects are too manifest to require any extended discussion. Webster, On Int. Law, vol. 1, §§ 213, 218; Wildman, Int. Law, vol. 1, ch. 2, § 7."

But the author does not consider us without a remedy. He proceeds:

"But it may be asked, shall the State, which is suffering from the piratical incursions organized in and emanating from a neighboring State, do nothing in self-defense and for self-preservation? Must she wait till the invading force crosses her own borders before she can attack or destroy it? Not at all. If the neighboring State, from the want either of the will or of the ability, neglects to prevent such excursions, or to suppress such organizations, the threatened State may cross the frontier and attack or destroy the threatened danger. But the act is one of hostility, and she performs it in the exercise of her belligerent rights, not in the exercise of a pacific right of self-defense. It is not necessary that such act should be preceded by a declaration of war, nor, indeed, that it should be followed by a public and solemn war in form; nevertheless, it is a belligerent act, justifiable, perhaps, by the circumstances of the case and the culpable neglect of the other party, and, as such, belongs to that class of hostile operations known in international jurisprudence as imperfect war, and which will be more particularly discussed in another chapter. (Wheaton, Elem. Int. Law, pt. 2, ch. 1, § 13; Grotius, de Jur. Bel. ac Pac. lib. 1, cap. 3, § 1; Burlamaqui, Droit de la Nat., &c., tome 5, pt. 4, ch. 3; Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, ch. 6, § 72.)"

My object is simply to call attention to the words of this learned writer, without myself expressing any opinion upon the point in question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as I supposed the fact to be, from recollection, no authority is cited by Halleck in support of his criticism on Phillimore. And, in truth, it will be seen that he differs with Phillimore as to the character of the right rather than as to the right itself, as to its proper designation rather than its existence. Phillimore considers it as a peaceful remedy, a peaceful right, of which the Government whose territory is invaded cannot justly complain. General Halleck considers it a belligerent right, and if it be a belligerent right it cannot be a just subject of complaint. Whether, therefore, it be called a belligerent right or a peaceful right is perfectly immaterial. All that I maintained, and all that General Dix evidently thought when he issued his order, was that there existed a right in the United States to take the course which he directed his officers to take.

A word in relation to what fell from the honorable member from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] It is very desirable, of course, that while we are determined to exact justice of all nations, we should see that we are not doing injustice ourselves in the particular of which we may complain. The honorable member says that our Government was wrong in surrendering Slidell and Mason. Perhaps the general sentiment of the people of the United States at that time was in accordance with that opinion. He supposes that the surrender was not justified; that England had no right to demand it, because she had been, before our war with her of 1812, in the habit of taking from the protection of our own flag those whom she claimed to owe allegiance to her. It is true that she made such a claim and acted upon it, but we never admitted it; on the contrary, from the first we denied it, and finally we went to war because of it; and although the asserted right was not formally surrendered by her at the termination of that war, yet in point of fact she has never since exercised it. It is indeed as effectually extinguished as if it had been expressly renounced, and I think the honorable member will find, if he will read the correspondence that passed between England and the United States in relation to her once asserted right, that the fixed opinion of the American people and Government was that such right was entirely without foundation.

A word more. It has been over and over again asserted by the press, and by many of our public men, that England did us great wrong in recognizing the confederate government at all as an existing government, and as such entitled to belligerent rights; that she did this too speedily. Now, we should remember that the doctrine is perfectly well settled with us that in the case of a civil revolution, if the revolting people are presented before the world as having a government in fact, and evincing a determination to maintain it intact, and apparently an ability to maintain it, its existence is to be admitted by all foreign nations, and all the consequent belligerent rights recognized. We did it in the case of South America. We have done it, and are now doing it, as the President tells us, if I recollect, in his message, in a much more recent instance. Maximilian put upon the throne, or attempted to be put upon the throne of Mexico by Napoleon, and a civil war waging between him and the former republic, the President tells us that he recognizes and observes strict neutrality between the two. This is precisely what England has done in our civil war, and it was done at the earliest moment, too, by us.

Now, I submit, under all the circumstances, can we justly complain that England acted too speedily? We should not forget what we have done ourselves. But what have we done in our war? This insurrection began in April, 1861. In July, 1861, the Congress of the United States by legislation recognized the existence of the war, and the Supreme Court in their decision in the prize cases at December term, 1862, relied upon that act as conclusive that the confederate government was a government de facto, and that we had the right to proceed against it by embargo, or by blockade, or in any other way known to the laws of nations, the same that we would have against a foreign nation with whom we might at any time be at war. And from that day to this, and indeed even before the 13th of July, 1861, when your first act was passed, we have recognized the confederate government as a government de facto, giving us for the time being every belligerent right. We have, therefore, been very quick in our own movements in following the example of Great Britain in the matter; in truth, we anticipated her, and that being the case, perhaps it would be as well for us not to complain very bitterly of what she has done.

The motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations was agreed to.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. WILSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to increase the number of cadets in and raise the standard of admission to the Military Academy.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 358) to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 360) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain bonds to the Secretary of the Interior for feeding the refugee Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 362) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 86) to provide against periodical rebel invasions of Missouri, and to protect the interests of the Government on the western border; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

DEPARTMENT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, the report made by Major General Herron, in compliance with orders instructing him to inspect the military department of Arkansas.

ARRESTS IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. POWELL submitted the following resolution, and asked for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all information in his possession bearing on the arrest and imprisonment of Colonel Richard J. Jacobs, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Kentucky, and Colonel Frank Woolford, one of the presidential electors of that State; particularly by whose order they were arrested and imprisoned, where they are at present confined, and what offenses are charged against them.

Mr. WILSON objected to the consideration of the resolution, and it lies over under the rules.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up the resolution which came from the House of Representatives this morning, proposing an adjournment over from Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when this House adjourns on Thursday, the 22d instant, it adjourn to meet on Thursday, January 5, 1865.

Mr. HOWE. If there be no objection, I prefer to have the resolution so amended that when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday next, they adjourn over. ["Oh, no."] Very well, I will not move the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. Cannot the resolution be so amended as to include both Houses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly it is in the power of the Senate to amend it as they may choose.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been usual at different sessions to amend it in that way. The House of Representatives usually, under the Constitution, ask leave of the Senate to adjourn themselves, and it is usual for the Senate to amend it so as to include both Houses. I move to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 22d instant, they adjourn to meet on Thursday, January 5, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

NATIONAL UNION INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 517) to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company, of Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that bill has not been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which it was referred.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. This bill was passed by the House of Representatives, and referred by the Senate to our Committee on the District of Columbia at the last session, according to my recollection. By that committee it was referred to a special sub-committee, consisting of the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] and another member. I think the Senator from Maine prepared some amendments to be submitted, which he thought were necessary as checks and guards to secure the public interest and to protect the persons who might be insured. I suggest to my colleague that he let the bill lie over until the Senator from Maine returns. I know that it was the sentiment of the committee that the bill as it came from the other House was defective. It does not correspond with the best regulated charters granted in the States, and it confers some extraordinary powers on the corporations.

Mr. HARLAN. I will say to my colleague that I conversed with the Senator from Maine, to whom he refers, at the close of the last session, and at that time he was prepared to vote for the bill, and would have reported it from the committee, and asked for its consideration by the Senate, if time had allowed; but lest I may be in error now, lest since then he may have discovered something that needs amendment, I will conform to the suggestion of my colleague, and move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

DISQUALIFICATION OF COLOR.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 62) to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mails, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. POWELL to the amendment reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, after the words "United States" to insert the words, "in all cases for robbing or violating the mails of the United States;" so that the amendment of the committee will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in the courts of the United States, in all cases for robbing or violating the mails of the United States, there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose that the amendment of the Committee be non-concurred in, as a bill on that subject has already been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator that a proposition of that sort became a law at the last session, I think.

Mr. SUMNER. I have already stated—the Senator perhaps did not hear what I said—that the amendment of the committee is now the law of the land, and therefore I propose that the Senate non-concur in the amendment and pass the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to have the bill read as it stands.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act no person, by reason of color, shall be disqualified from employment in carrying the mails, and all acts and parts of acts establishing such disqualification, including especially the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1825, are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, and Wright—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalow, Carlile, Chandler, Colman, Cowan, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, McQuiggall, Morrill, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps I am too late to vote. I came in for the purpose of voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The result had been announced before the Senator addressed the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask leave to vote with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Senator from Maryland was in the Chamber before the result was announced, and I hope he will be permitted to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read the rule.

Mr. FOSTER, (to Mr. JOHNSON.) The rule is positive.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I waive the motion. I understand it is against the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is very explicit. The Chair will read it for the information of the Senator.

"17. When the yeas and nays shall be taken upon any question, in pursuance of the above rule, no member shall be permitted, under any circumstances whatever, to vote after the decision is announced from the Chair."

Mr. JOHNSON. In point of fact I was making the motion before the result was announced. I should have voted "ay;" that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It might have been possible that the Chair did not hear the Senator.

MARY SCALES ACCARDI.

Mr. FOSTER. There are on the Calendar a few private bills, mostly House bills, reported from the Committee on Pensions. They are not of great public importance, but they are of very much importance to the individuals interested, and if they can be passed before the holidays, they will make a good many hearts glad. I hope the Senate will indulge me in calling them up. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 394, for the relief of Mary Scales Accardi.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary Scales Accardi, the widow of Salvador Accardi, upon the roll of widows of invalid pensioners, and that she be paid a pension, at the rate of six dollars per month, commencing with the date of the decease of her husband.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment to strike out the words "with the date of the decease of her husband," and to insert "July 1, 1862."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

HARRIS WELCH.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 542) to grant a pension of eight dollars per month to Harris Welch. The bill provides that Harris Welch, of Charlestown, Massachusetts, a sergeant of company B, in a New York regiment of volunteers known as the Leslie Guards, shall be entitled to a pension of eight dollars per month, to commence from the 1st day of October, 1861, and to be continued and paid to him during his life.

Mr. FOSTER. This bill has been reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions. I therefore move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

EMILY A. LYON.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of Emily A. Lyon, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Emily A. Lyon, widow of Alfred M. Lyon, late a sutler in the twenty-third Iowa regiment of infantry, and who died in the service of his country the 17th day of May, 1863, upon the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the said 17th day of May, 1863, to continue during her widowhood: Provided, That proof satisfactory to the Commissioner of Pensions be made of the material facts above related.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Emily A. Lyon, widow of Alfred M. Lyon, a late sutler in the twenty-third regiment of Iowa volunteers, but who volunteered as a private in company A of the said regiment, and while serving in that capacity was mortally wounded at the battle of Black river, Mississippi, on the 17th day of May, 1863, and died on the field; the said pension to be at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 17th day of May, 1863, and continuing during the widowhood of the pensioner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES M. POTT.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 478) for the relief of Charles M. Pott, which requires the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Charles M. Pott, late of company K, one hundred and seventy-ninth Pennsylvania militia, on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the date of his discharge, March 7, 1863, for total disability sustained by the loss of an arm by accident while in the hospital detained for his pay after his discharge had been ordered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REBECCA S. HARRISON.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the naval pension roll the name of Rebecca S. Harrison, widow of the late Lieutenant Horace N. Harrison, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, to commence from the 1st of April, 1864, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 597) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 601) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States"—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 603) to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from public stores—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 124) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864—to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 329) for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 350) to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes;

A bill (S. No. 352) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 83) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in the conflict with the piratical craft the Alabama, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 84) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, United States Navy, and to the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albemarle, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864.

FREEDOM OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 82.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States. For the purpose of encouraging enlistments and promoting the efficiency of the military and naval forces of the United States, the resolution provides that the wife and children, if any he have, of any person that has been, or may be, mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, shall, from and after its passage, be forever free, any law, usage, or custom whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding; and in determining who is or was the wife and who are the children of an enlisted person, evidence that he and the woman claimed to be his wife have cohabited together, or associated as husband and wife, and so continued to cohabit or associate at the time of the enlistment, or evidence that a form or ceremony of marriage (whether such marriage was or was not authorized or recognized by law) has been entered into or celebrated by them, and that the parties thereto thereafter lived together, or associated or cohabited as husband and wife, and so continued to live, cohabit, or associate at the time of the enlistment, shall be deemed sufficient proof of marriage, and the children born during the continuance of any such marriage shall be deemed and taken to be the children embraced within the provisions of the act, whether such marriage shall or shall not have been dissolved at the time of such enlistment.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to amend the resolution by striking out after the word "born," in the twenty-second line, the words "during the continuance;" so that it will read:

And the children born of any such marriage shall be deemed and taken to be the children embraced within the provisions of this act, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did it come from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; it came from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will be on referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope it will not be referred. I think this is a measure that ought to have been passed three years ago. I tried one or two years ago to have the principles embodied in this joint resolution incorporated in a bill which was before the Senate at that time in relation to enlistments. I do not want to see any further delay in this matter. I think the resolution ought to be passed immediately.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise simply to express the earnest hope that this joint resolution will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, or any other committee. The Committee on Military Affairs have three times reported the substance of this resolution in other bills. It simply provides that the wives and children of the soldiers of the Republic shall be made free. The needs of the country, more than justice or humanity, have weaponed the hand of the slave. We have enlisted many thousands of them. They are to-day in the trenches before Richmond and Petersburg, and on the shores of the Carolinas; and they keep watch and ward over the Mississippi from Cairo to the Gulf. They are everywhere doing their duty, and their whole duty, bravely and well. Butler and Banks, Meade and Burnside, Warren and Hancock, and Lieutenant General Grant have all borne testimony to their fidelity, their courage, and their services. Officers who have served with the best regiments of the armies of the East and of the West, officers who have fought in many battles, say that these colored troops, for industry, obedience, courage, and conduct, are surpassed by no troops in the service of the country. The Government could not dispense with their services without periling the cause of the country.

It is estimated that from seventy-five to one hundred thousand wives and children of these soldiers are now held in slavery. It is a burning shame to this country; it is an indecency for the American people to hold the wives and the children in slavery of men who are periling their lives before the rebel legions. This measure of patriotism, justice, and humanity ought to have been passed many months ago; it surely ought to have been passed early in the last session. We have made the slave free when he becomes a soldier. Whenever the slave enlists, he is a freeman forever more; and thousands of them have enlisted since we passed that beneficent act. At least twenty thousand slaves have enlisted since that act was passed giving personal freedom to the slave who enrolls his name on the muster-rolls of the country's defenders.

The nation now needs defenders. For the purpose of encouraging enlistments it is proposed that the wife and the child of the slave who will fight the battles of the country, shall, like himself, be free. Heart, reason, and conscience demand it. Self-respect and decency require it. The right to do it is unquestionable. There is no doubt, there can be no doubt, of the right of the Government of the country to give freedom to the man who will fight its battles, or to give freedom to his wife and child to encourage him to fight. There is no doubt, there can be no doubt, that the nation has the right to encourage the slave to enlist, or to inspire him to deeds of heroic daring for his country, by making the wife he loves, and the children who bear his name and inherit his blood, free evermore. That the freedom of wife and child will encourage the husband and father to enlist none can doubt; that it will inspire the soldier to the performance of duty, to deeds of heroism, none can question. Wasting diseases, weary marches and bloody battles are decimating our armies. The country needs soldiers, must have soldiers. Let the Senate then act now. Let us hasten the enactment of this beneficent measure, inspired by patriotism and hallowed by justice and humanity, so that ere merry Christmas shall come the intelligence shall be flashed over the land, to cheer the hearts of the nation's defenders, and arouse the manhood of the bondman, that on the forehead of the soldier's wife and the soldier's child no man can write slave.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand the question before the Senate to be upon the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky that this joint resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I do not understand that upon that motion the merits of the measure come up, nor am I able to see the force of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts which he draws from the fact, as he alleges it to be, that the negroes have proved themselves to be good soldiers in the field; nor do I think the question of humanity toward the family arises upon this particular motion.

The question is, ought this resolution to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary? I think it should go there. I am not able to see how, under the Constitution of the United States, Congress can free the servant who is held to servitude by the laws of a State. I do not understand that Congress has ever done that, and in former days it was not claimed by any of the statesmen who peculiarly held the confidence of the country. This particular question, whether we have the constitutional power to pass the resolution ought not to be considered by the Military Committee. The Senator says this measure has been considered by that committee some three times. That committee is not the organ of this body to bring before the body information upon a question of constitutional power. That information we expect to derive through the labors of the Judiciary Committee.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 5.

I believe the bill of the last session providing for the enlistment of negro troops did also provide that they should become free; but that, as I understood it at the time, was placed upon the ground that the Government took from the citizen property to be used in war, and that the Government made compensation to the loyal owner. It is not proposed now to take the persons whom this resolution proposes to make free for the use of the Government. This is the exercise of the power to free the slaves in the States without reference to their use in the Army. This question, I think, ought to be considered by the Judiciary Committee, and for that reason I shall support the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. POWELL. I concur with the Senator from Indiana, that this resolution should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Massachusetts says there is no doubt about our power to pass this resolution. With deference to the Senator, I think there are the gravest doubts. I have no doubt myself on the subject. I think it is palpably unconstitutional. The Judiciary Committee is certainly the proper organ of this Senate to give us information on that subject.

The Senator, by this resolution, proposes to free the wives and children of those who have enlisted in the Army heretofore, as well as those who may hereafter enlist in the Army, and he has entitled the resolution "A resolution to encourage enlistments." You certainly would not encourage enlistments so far as those persons are in the Army of the United States, and the larger portion of the negroes in the border States able to bear arms are already in the Army. The passage of this resolution could not encourage those persons to go into the Army. But it proceeds to emancipate and set free the wives and the children of those who are already in the Army. Where is the power, under the Constitution, to do that? You admit that in those States where they are property. Has this Congress any power by a legislative enactment to divest a citizen of any State of this Union of his property? Certainly not, except upon one contingency, and that is when it is required for the public use, and making compensation for it. If you take private property for public use, you must make compensation for it first. That is the Constitution of your country. When Congress passed the bill to enlist those persons in the Army, the bill was accompanied with a provision pretending to make some compensation, indicating a commission that should give to their masters, in certain cases, not over $300, and $100 in other cases. Meager and insignificant as was the compensation held out to the country in that bill, no compensation has ever yet been made.

But, sir, this proposition does not provide for any compensation at all. The other, I admit, was a mere bagatelle, providing for the payment of an insignificant amount (which the Government has never paid, within my knowledge,) for the purpose of quieting the consciences of Senators who might vote for it. But I ask Senators if there is any power in this Congress to take private property without making just compensation therefor? There certainly is not, unless your Constitution is a dead letter; and, Senators, if you pass this measure, you will have to do it by walking over the plain provisions of the Constitution of your country.

The Senator from Massachusetts cannot say that so far as these persons are in the service this is a measure encouraging enlistments, because they are already in the service; and in my State the husbands and fathers of four fifths of those whom it is proposed to emancipate by this resolution are already in the Army. You do not propose to give one shilling of compensation. Senators, if you pass this resolution, in my humble judgment those who vote for it will be faithless to the Constitution of their country. I verily believe that all the woes that are now upon us have arisen because the people and the politicians have been faithless to the fundamental law of the land. I know that in these times those who stand up for the Constitution of the country and the constitutional liberties of the people are rather mocked and derided; but while I am here I shall obey that Constitution.

I hope, sir, that this resolution may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that we may have the opinion of that committee as to its constitutionality. I hope the motion of my colleague will prevail.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, inasmuch as this question is likely to lead to a protracted debate, which will not be settled to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The call of the States for bills on leave having been completed, the Speaker proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States and Territories for resolutions, resuming the call with the State of Delaware, where it was last suspended.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask its adoption. I desire to say that it is the same resolution that was laid on the table on Thursday last, I am inclined to believe partly from misapprehension on the part of the House and partly by my own fault. I ask the previous question on the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law; and the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition while pending and undetermined is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question until I can make a motion to amend, and then I will renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will do so.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the word "President" and to insert "Executive Departments" in lieu thereof, and upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the previous question be not sustained, will the resolution go over?

The SPEAKER. It will if debate arises.

Mr. PRUYN. I do not rise to debate, but to ask the gentleman from Maryland to make one other modification of his resolution by striking out the last clause. There may, under certain circumstances, be occasion for diplomatic explanation. It strikes me that the broad language used there is objectionable.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I cannot agree to that modification. It is one of the first and most important principles in the popular body in a free Government that its proceedings, while pending, shall not be made the subject of diplomatic explanation.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 68, noes 43.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not distinctly understood whether the gentleman from Maryland accepted the amendment I proposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did accept it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. FARNSWORTH'S motion, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 73, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Arnold, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Hale, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Smith, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elithu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilson, and Windom—49.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Law, LeBlond, Mallory, Marcy, McClurg, McKinney, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Yeaman—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashley, Blaine, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Donnelly, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Fenton, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kibbelsch, King, Lazenar, Loan, Long, McAllister, McDowell, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Norton, Odell, Patterson, Perham, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Shannon, Starr, William G. Steele, Stiles, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—60.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. SLOAN stated that Mr. WHEELER was detained at home by sickness.

Mr. ANCONA made a similar statement in regard to Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHANNON, who was not within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. DAWES objected.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon ordering the main question.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to ask the consent of the gentleman from Maryland to modify the resolution by inserting the words "policy of" before the words "such proposition," near the close of the resolution. That was what I meant when I rose before, but it appears my meaning was not quite understood by him.

The SPEAKER. It is beyond the power of the gentleman from Maryland to accept any modification of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is beyond my power, and I would not make that modification if I had the power.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to know if this resolution comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. It is offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COX. It was referred to that committee, and reported back.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with one exception. To-day I offer it as the Representative of the third district of Maryland.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is what I supposed, and as the Representative of the third district of Illinois, I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the yeas and nays could not be taken on a motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, because the yeas and nays could not be taken on the original question, which was on seconding the previous question. The motion to reconsider is governed by the same rules, and must be decided by tellers or by a division of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, and call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to make an inquiry, in order that I may understand the resolution. I understand it to be the same resolution that was reported last week from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with the single exception that this morning, in order to obviate some objection made, when it was under consideration before, as to the use of the word "President," which was thought to point at the Chief Executive, particularly, and perhaps invidiously, the modification proposed was accepted, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which was, to strike out the word "President" and insert the words "Executive Departments." I think it stands in that way now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is correct.

Mr. SCHENCK. And that it is precisely the resolution that came from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, excepting that modification of the language, to remove the objection then taken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And which resolution the House voted to lay on the table when the question was last up.

Mr. SCHENCK. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution had not been modified it would not be in order, as the previous resolution had been laid on the table by a vote of the House. The gentleman from Maryland having modified the resolution, brings it within the rules.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to know what would be the effect of the House refusing to order the main question to be now put.

The SPEAKER. That would divest the resolution of the force of the previous question.

Mr. ARNOLD. And the resolution would then go over?

The SPEAKER. Yes, if any gentleman rose to debate it.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, at present, to rise to debate it, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. What is the question now?

The SPEAKER. The question is "Shall the main question be now ordered?" on which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 563) in addition to the "Act respecting quarantine and health laws" approved February 25, 1799, and for the better execution of the third section thereof;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 106) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of certain moneys therein mentioned; and Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend a portion of the contingent fund for enlarging the Navy Department Building.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, the question being, "Shall the main question be now put?" on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 56, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Law, Lazenar, LeBlond, Mallory, Marcy, McClurg, McKinney, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Joseph W. White, and Williams—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Hale, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elithu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilson, and Windom—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Ashley, Bailly, Blaine, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Fenton, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kibbelsch, King, Loan, Long, McAllister, McDowell, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Norton, Odell, Radford, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—55.

So the main question was ordered, which was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I call for a division of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see whether it is susceptible of division.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I withdraw the call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the last clause of the resolution is not a substantive proposition, but the last two clauses are.

Mr. PRUYN. The last two lines, "and such proposition, while pending and undetermined, is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power," contain, I think, a substantive proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman to state what the effect would be if the first part of the resolution were rejected and the last part adopted. That must be the test.

Mr. PRUYN. I respectfully submit that the Chair has no right to suppose the House would be guilty of such a proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot suppose what the House may or may not do, but the division of a resolution must be of such a character as that either part can stand by itself.

Mr. WILSON. I call for a vote on the first proposition, and on the last two.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution in the only manner in which the Chair thinks it can be divided.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is it not too late to ask for a division?

The SPEAKER. It is not. At any time previous to the vote a division can be demanded.

The Clerk read the following portion of the resolution:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and proscribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the executive department to respect that policy, not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of national force when authorized by law.

The SPEAKER. This first part of the resolution can be voted upon separately. The Clerk will now read the last part, which can also be voted upon separately.

The Clerk read, as follows:

And the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition, while pending and undetermined, is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign Power.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for a division of the resolution in the manner indicated by the Chair.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on both divisions of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays upon the first division of the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is not necessary to take the yeas and nays on that. We will all vote for it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the first division of the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 8, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. NAYS—Messrs. Blair, Boutwell, Cole, Francis W. Kellogg, Littlejohn, Pomeroy, Smith, and Van Valkenburgh—8.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashley, Bailly, Blaine, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Donnelly, Dumont, Elliot, English, Fenton, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Benjamin G. Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—56.

So the first division of the resolution was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the second division of the resolution.

The yeas and nays, having been demanded by Mr. Cox, were ordered.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is it in order to lay this branch of the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

A MEMBER. We may just as well vote it down.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the second division of the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the Speaker to decide that that motion is in order?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Will the adoption of that motion lay the whole resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It will not. The first part has been adopted. The latter part is subject to the action of the House in the same manner as an independent proposition.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay this part of the resolution on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 67, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Elliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Hale, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—54.

So the House refused to lay on the table the second division of the resolution.

When the call of the roll had been concluded, Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, asked unanimous consent to record his vote.

Mr. DAWES objected.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the last part of the resolution, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 58, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Harrington, Charles M. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—56.

So the latter part of the resolution was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. LONGYEAR, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. DAWES objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the several votes by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 350) authorizing the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes; and

An act (S. No. 229) for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster of the United States Army.

BROOKLYN NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, asking an appropriation of $75,000 for addition to the Brooklyn navy-yard, which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DIFFICULTIES ON CANADIAN BORDER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the House relative to the difficulties on our northern border, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

TAX ON WHISKY.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The bill, which was read, provides that section fifty-five of the act referred to be amended by striking out the word "February," wherever it occurs in said section, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "January;" and further, that in addition to the duty now imposed by law, all spirits of domestic production held for sale on the 1st of January, 1865, shall be subject to a duty of fifty cents per gallon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules in order that I may have leave to report the bill and have it considered.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 79, noes 20.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the rules were suspended.

The bill was received, and read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire immediate action on that bill. If it is to be acted on at all before the holidays, it must be acted on now. Therefore I move that we proceed at once to consider it.

I beg to say that the Committee of Ways and Means have reported this bill, one portion according to their idea of what will be for the benefit of the revenue—that is the first section—and the other portion under the instructions of this House. If there is no disposition to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask that we now act on the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the first section explained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is not fully understood.

Mr. ANCONA. I make the point of order that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That would be a good point of order if the House had not suspended the rules for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill in the House at the present time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will let me ask a question.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the previous question until I can make a statement, and then I will renew it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the second section imposes the additional tax of fifty cents per gallon on all spirits held for sale on the 1st day of January. It is a well-known fact that throughout the western section of the country, where large amounts of spirits have been accumulated by the distillers themselves, those stocks are in the bonded warehouses with scarcely an exception, and held with the intention of holding them as heretofore for such markets as may turn up. Do I understand that the effect of that section is that on the 1st of January all spirits held by the original manufacturers shall be taxed an additional fifty cents, but that that which is held by speculators shall not be subject to the additional tax?

Mr. STEVENS. I will explain what I understand by the bill, and after having done so, unless some gentleman desires to ask some question, I will call the previous question.

The first section of the bill contains the views of the Committee of Ways and Means, while the second section has been reported, against the judgment of the Committee of Ways and Means, but in obedience to the instructions of the House, under a resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] We could not, under that resolution, report any amended revenue bill without inserting what we have, namely, a tax on whisky on hand. We have thought that perhaps this House, as a final adjustment of this whole question, would be content to anticipate, by one month, the tax of two dollars upon what will be largely distilled between this and the 1st of February, and agree with the committee to strike out the second section—which motion I now make—which we have reported in obedience to the instructions of the House. But if they choose to retain both, it is not in the power of the committee to say it shall not be done. The committee, however, ask that the House will pass the first section, laying the tax of two dollars upon all distilled after the 1st of January, because we think the Government will thereby obtain a very large revenue, as the distillation season is just commencing. If we pass it speedily, there will be no delay until after the holidays, and everybody will be prepared to go on and distill under that arrangement.

The second section, of course I need not say to the House who have seen our previous record here, is repugnant to the views of the Committee of Ways and Means. I now ask that they will strike it out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not withdraw the demand for the previous question with the expectation that the gentleman would make any motion, but only that he would submit his remarks. I demanded the previous question for the purpose of preventing any such thing.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope the House will refuse to sustain the previous question so that I can move the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. The House cannot understand this section from the explanation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 62.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose the House will very well understand that if this bill is passed with both sections embraced, it will be impossible for it to be acted upon in this House and the other before the adjournment for the holidays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We will not adjourn, then.

Mr. MORRILL. It has become important that this question should be settled, and settled now. It is important to the revenue that this whole question should be put at rest. For three or four months past we have obtained no revenue from the manufacture of this article, and as long as the question is agitated we shall obtain none. The bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means merely antedates the amount of duties to be levied on the 1st of February, and proposes that they shall be levied on the 1st of January.

The last section of the bill is in the precise language of the proposition introduced at the last session taxing stocks on hand. It is not drawn with remarkable skill, but we thought that if the House was satisfied with it at the last session they would be as well satisfied with it at this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that many gentlemen in this House who have heretofore voted for this tax upon stocks on hand have essentially changed their minds; certainly more than enough to change the result on the last vote have so expressed themselves to me. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who was for this tax at the last session, is decidedly of the opinion that it would be wise now to abandon it.

I move to strike out the last section of the bill, and upon that question and upon the whole bill I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a few moments, to allow me to say a word or two.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman was not very accommodating to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. STEVENS,] and I decline to withdraw it.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I again appeal to the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. MORRILL. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, holding the floor myself.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio had the floor and moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand how the gentleman got the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont demanded the previous question and took his seat, whereupon the gentleman from Ohio moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That was pending a negotiation between the gentleman from Vermont and myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont had stated that he refused to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table in the hope that the obnoxious section will be stricken out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only desire to say one word upon this question, because I have spoken on it times enough for the House to understand fully my position, and the country too, although that, perhaps, is of little importance.

This House, on the first day of the session, instructed the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in this very proposition by a majority of two or three votes. The committee have brought it in and coupled it with another proposition by which, it seems to me, they seek to avoid the responsibility of imposing this tax upon stocks on hand.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman's original resolution instructed us to couple it with other amendments. It instructed us to include in any amendments we might propose. We were not at liberty to report it by itself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The proposition is brought in here by the Committee of Ways and Means in obedience to a vote of instructions by this House. The gentleman from Vermont says there have been a sufficient number of changes, according to his own knowledge, to change that vote of the House which was had on the first day of the session. Who those gentlemen are who have had new light on the subject of course will be seen by the vote.

Now, sir, I stand upon this proposition the same as I have always stood. I have advocated it as a measure of revenue, and in a conversation with the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate but a few days since, he said that he could demonstrate that by the refusal of Congress to impose this tax, the Government had lost $70,000,000.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has no right to quote the action of any member of a committee in the other House to influence us here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am not quoting the action of any member of a committee. I am speaking of the man himself.

Mr. COX. I submit to the Chair if that is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to quote the transactions of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if the same gentleman did not advise him to give up this contest.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; the same gentleman agrees with me on the subject. The same gentleman desires to see the revenues of the country increased, and he desires that these gamblers and speculators shall pay their portion. They have made millions, and tens of millions, which have come out of the pockets of the people; and we now have this proposition here which is reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and I appeal to the Representatives of the people to stand up to it, and vote it through. I have understood that it has been asserted that a sort of compromise has been entered into, that if the first section of the bill be adopted the other section will be abandoned.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman from Illinois charge that against the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Not at all, sir. I did not refer to the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. I expected the gentleman from Illinois to say that, while the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the other House thought there had been $70,000,000 lost to the Government by the failure to tax the stock on hand, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in this House thought there had been $30,000,000 lost by the agitation of the subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Even according to that there would be a balance of $40,000,000 on my side. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I know nothing of any compromises on this question. I make no compromises on it myself, and I do not know that anybody else is disposed to compromise it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I have this to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. The question, as now presented, is very different from the question as presented at the last session of Congress. If a tax had been levied on the stock on hand at that time it might have reached a large amount. At present it would not do so. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is of the opinion that the stock on hand has been nearly consumed. Under these circumstances gentlemen may very well be pardoned for changing their minds on this subject. If there were no other reason against taxing the stock on hand, the fact that we can obtain so much more revenue, that the distilleries would go into operation if the question were only at once settled, and settled finally, is a sufficient argument against it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The best way in the world to settle it is to impose the tax.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the House understands the question fully. I have no sort of feeling on the subject. I am as much in favor of raising the largest amount of revenue as any man in this House can be. I would be willing, for one, that we should raise the entire amount of the annual expenditure for the war by taxation. I only want that the wisest modes shall be selected. I do not believe that this is one of them. I now renew my previous motion to strike out the second section of the bill; and on that, and the whole bill, I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first on the motion to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 60, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Aucona, Ashley, Bailey, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Holman, Hooper, Keweenaw, Kelley, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mahory, Marcy, McBride, McDade, Morrill, James R. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—57.

So the second section of the bill was struck out.

Messrs. SCHENCK and FARNSWORTH, not being within the bar when their names were called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. DAWES objected.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the second section of the bill was struck out; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 56, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. NOT VOTING.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, William G. Brown, Clay, Cravens, Creswell, Donnelly, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Fenton, Gooch, Gridler, Hall, Benjamin G. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Thomas, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—61.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to give notice that, if that section be stricken out, I shall offer it to every proposition to which it may be appropriate.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. No. 83) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in her conflict with the piratical craft the Alabama, in compliance with the President's recommendation to Congress of the 5th of December, 1864;

Joint resolution (S. No. 84) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, of the United States Navy, and the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albatross, in compliance with the President's recommendation of December 5, 1864; and

An act (S. No. 222) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. I want to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There is some business that ought to be done in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] desires to make a speech in the Committee of the Whole, and I therefore withdraw my motion for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the motion that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment in order that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

UNITED STATES CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. PRICE. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, granted to the United States Christian Commission for their public anniversary meeting, to be held on Sunday evening, January 29, 1865.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am compelled to object to that, and all other similar propositions.

Mr. PRICE. I move to suspend the rules in order to allow the introduction of the resolution. I do not see why the resolution should be objectionable to any one. On the motion to suspend the rules I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PRICE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRICE and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye forty-six, noes not counted.

Less than two thirds voting in favor of the motion, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HALE. I ask my colleague to withdraw the motion for a moment, to allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw for that purpose.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HALE. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House a sufficient number of extra copies of the Dictionary of Congress to make the quota of the House equal to that already ordered by the Senate: Provided, That the copyright hereby directed to be paid by the Clerk shall not exceed per copy what was heretofore allowed for the same work.

Several MEMBERS objected to the introduction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution being objected to, is not before the House.

Mr. HALE. Does it not go to the Committee on Printing under the rules?

The SPEAKER. It would, if it were regularly introduced; but any member can object to its introduction.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to introduce a bill simply for reference.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

UNITED STATES COURT IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for additional terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the southern district of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEVENS. I now again renew the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the object in going into Committee of the Whole is simply for the purpose of allowing speeches to be made. I therefore ask that, by unanimous consent, it be understood that when the Committee of the Whole shall rise no further business shall be done in the House this afternoon.

No objection was made.

The question being taken on Mr. STEVENS's motion, it was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FARNSWORTH in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, when, at the last sitting of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I submitted the motion which at this time gives me the floor, my only purpose was to bring about an adjournment of the House. But as, by parliamentary rule, the privilege of speaking is accorded to me, I shall improve the opportunity to congratulate the committee and the country upon the dignified and patriotic character of the President's message, which is, by a like rule, made the first subject for our consideration.

The President gives us to understand in this, his annual message, that the condition of our foreign affairs is "reasonably satisfactory"—that is to say, that amicable relations with all foreign Powers are still preserved through the arts of diplomacy. He says, however, that unforeseen political difficulties have arisen on the "northern boundary of the United States," and, "in view of the insecurity of life and property in the region adjacent to the Canadian border, by reason of recent assaults and depredations, committed by inimical and desperate persons, who are harbored there, it has been thought proper to give notice that, after the expiration of six months, the period conditionally stipulated in the existing arrangement with Great Britain, the United States must hold themselves at liberty to increase their naval armament upon the lakes if they shall find that proceeding necessary."

Mr. Chairman, as the Representative of a wealthy, intelligent, and highly patriotic population in the immediate vicinity of one of these great lakes, whose peaceful waters have the last summer been rudely violated by the marauders from Canada, I desire to thank the President for this signal manifestation of executive firmness and sagacity.

It should not be forgotten that this House of Representatives at its last session adopted with a good degree of unanimity a joint resolution, emanating from the Committee on Naval Affairs, requesting the Executive to give to Great Britain this very notice so vitally important to the commerce of the lakes and to the security of the inhabitants living upon their borders. This resolution "fell asleep" in the Senate.

Another resolution touching the interests of the British provinces in a strictly commercial point, and giving reciprocity in fact where none existed but in name, has recently passed this House in accordance with the just expectations of the people, and they seem now to be waiting somewhat impatiently the further action of coördinate branches of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware of the delicacy of our relations with Great Britain, and have no disposition at this moment to provoke open hostilities with her; but I am free to confess that I do not look upon that Power as a friend to the United States. She is greatly ambitious to be the leader of the nations by means of her supremacy on the ocean, and she is preëminently selfish in all that appertains to commerce and trade. In both of these particulars, a Navy and commercial marine, the United States having peace within her own borders, would speedily overshadow her. Neither do I fear Great Britain. This Government has no occasion to fear her, for, with all her wealth and military and naval strength, the loyal people of the United States are at this moment, with the "great rebellion" on their hands, more than a match for her. While we deprecate war with foreign nations, we should always remember that the surest way to avoid that calamity is to be fully prepared for the emergency. Pusillanimous legislation and pusillanimous diplomacy will bring ruin upon a nation sooner than armed legions. It is therefore the true policy of our Republic to be continually "girding on her armor," to erect fortifications upon her exposed coasts and borders, to establish dock-yards and depots upon the shores of our inland seas, as well as upon the shores of our two great oceans.

The message informs us that the financial affairs of the Government have been beneficially affected by the legislation of the last session of Congress. The receipts into the Treasury from all sources during the year, in cash, were $834,076,646, of which there was derived from customs $102,316,152; from lands, $589,333; from direct taxes, $475,648; from internal revenue, $109,741,134; from miscellaneous sources, $47,511,448; and from loans, $623,443,929. The disbursements were, in the sum total, $865,234,087, of which the War Department consumed $690,791,842, and the Navy Department $85,733,292. These estimates, it will be noted, were made on the 1st day of July, 1864, at which time the increased tariff and internal duties were hardly felt at the national Treasury. The national debt, at that date, was $1,740,630,489. It is believed that by a judicious revision of the system of tariff and taxation, and especially by the imposition of a reasonable duty upon sales of all sorts, the internal revenue may be made to exceed the sum of $300,000,000 a year, without being burdensome to our people. What a picture that will present of the unfathomable resources of our great nation! Not yet fourscore years of age, and with one third of the States in open and active rebellion for four years, sustaining an Army of a million men, and a Navy of seven hundred ships of war, and yet not one dollar borrowed, except from our own loyal citizens! And still we have but a faint conception of the wonderful resources of the United States Government and people. I am persuaded that I speak within the bounds of modesty and truth when I say that a single article of commerce, almost unknown to the arts at the breaking out of the rebellion, will command annually, in the market, money enough to pay the interest on our national debt.

It is gratifying to learn from the message that notwithstanding the exactions for the military service, some nine thousand persons had been enabled to enter lands for farms during the five quarters preceding the 30th day of September last, under the benign provisions of the homestead law. This is the only legitimate mode of making sovereigns in our country—lords of the soil—and they will be very apt to stand by the Government whence they have derived their title of aggrandizement.

It is painful to hear of the devastating effects of war upon our fighting population; and, at the same time, we are happy to know that republics are not, all of them, ungrateful. The President tells us there have been placed on the Army pension rolls, during the year, twenty-two thousand one hundred and ninety-eight widows, orphans, and mothers. The number seems large, but we must increase the list until every dependent relative of a deceased soldier shall, by the bounty of the Government, be made secure against want. Then, and not till then, shall we be permitted to sing—

"How sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest."

We are told by the President, in his own peculiar style, that society is "being molded for durability in the Union;" and as evidence of the fact, he points to the Monumental City, and says, in words that thrill the patriotic breast, "Maryland is secure to liberty and Union for all the future. The genius of rebellion will no more claim Maryland." All honor to Maryland! All honor to the noble men who have been instrumental in rescuing that old and respected Commonwealth from the incubus of slavery! Henceforth Maryland is destined to shine, in the galaxy of States, as a star of the first magnitude.

With respectful submission I here venture to suggest that the President has himself performed an official act since the commencement of the present session of Congress that will do more in the future toward "molding society for durability in the Union" than any conceivable action of any one State.

The President adverts in his message to the recent quadrennial election as evidence of the will of the people in favor of the constitutional amendment for the prohibition of slavery throughout the United States. He is clearly right in this, so far as regards the sentiments of at least three fourths of the voters in the loyal States. It is in vain that politicians plant themselves upon the track of progress and attempt to impede the car of freedom! It is in vain that the learned, eloquent, but erratic Representative from the city of New York invokes "toleration" in behalf of an institution that he says "was tolerated by the Saviour and His apostles." The enlightened sense of the age in which we live imperatively demands the complete extinction of slavery; the voices of two hundred thousand of our sons who have fallen a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom cry to us from their graves, "Extinguish slavery!" The widows and orphans of the slaughtered soldiers implore us to "abolish slavery." Two hundred thousand stalwart men with bayonets in their hands, once slaves, but now soldiers of the Union, admonish us to wipe out the foul stain of slavery; but, above all, right and justice and the perpetuity of our free institutions of government call upon us to remove this curse from the land.

And why should gentlemen on the other side of this House hesitate in this matter? Have they not always, as partisan politicians, expressed a desire to abolish slavery so soon as they could do it in a constitutional manner? And now what are they asked to do by their votes? Simply to aid the majority in giving a two-thirds vote, so that the proposition to amend the Constitution may be submitted to the people of the States through their Representatives in the legislative bodies. If they refuse to do this, what is the just inference? That they are so wedded to the institution of slavery that they will not trust the people with the privilege of saying whether or not it shall continue its existence in the land. If they refuse to do this, what is the inevitable consequence? The Thirty-Ninth Congress will adopt the measure within one week of its organization, and then the issue will be with the country, in all time to come, which body most truly represented the wishes and interests of the great American people.

In connection with this subject of amending the Constitution so as to prohibit slavery in the land, I commend to the consideration of gentlemen on both sides of the House the following historical fact: Colonel George Mason, of Virginia, one of the distinguished statesmen who assisted in framing the Constitution, nevertheless refused to give it the sanction of his name, and protested against its adoption for this among other reasons by him publicly assigned:

"The general Legislature [Congress] is restrained from prohibiting the further importation of slaves for twenty odd years; though such importations render the United States weaker, more vulnerable, and less capable of defense."

Is it not passing strange that one of the fathers in the days of Virginia's manhood should object to our national charter because it contained "a negative" upon prohibition of the slave trade, and, at this day, after three fourths of a century's experience of the wisdom of that objection there should be found in this Hall men nurtured in the lap of freedom and blessed with all the precious privileges appertaining to free institutions who by their voices and their votes express a determination to scourge their posterity as we in our day are scourged with the curse of human slavery?

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to make an anti-slavery speech on this floor. I agree with the gentleman from New York in his declaration publicly made at the last session, that "SLAVERY IS DEAD."

But I do desire to "set a seal" upon the door of its tomb. Such a seal, in my judgment, will require the proposed amendment of the Constitution.

I do not advert, Mr. Chairman, to the long string of hallucinations introduced by the gentleman from New York into his speech to show a pretended parallelism between the patriotic efforts of "Burke and Fox and Chatham and Camden" and others of the British Parliament, in the early days of the American Revolution, and the treasonable ravings of disappointed politicians in another and different arena. I turn all such contestants over to another and different tribunal where more summary justice may be administered. I will stop long enough, however, to say to the gentleman from New York that since he made his proud boast, on Wednesday last, that his "southern brethren could never be subjugated," very much evidence has accumulated on that point. I send to the Clerk the remarks of a morning paper on the present aspect of military affairs, and beg leave to say that I heartily agree with the patriotic editor in his ascriptions of praise to the heads of the War and Navy Departments, and to the officers and soldiers of our armies.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"THE SITUATION.—The cause looks grandly upward.

From every quarter of the theater of war come glorious tidings. Everywhere where the flag of the nation floats over the embattled hosts of the Union, it is borne in triumph. We give this morning the proudest bulletin of the war. It makes a noble record for the presiding genius whose masterly intellect controls the movements of the Union armies from his unobtrusive headquarters at City Point, for the executive talent of the great War Minister and his subordinates, whose unwearied activity and promptitude furnish in abundance the requisite material for so many distant armies, for the military talent and aptitude for command of the leaders who are so nobly guiding our troops to victory, and for the daring endurance and patriotic enthusiasm of the rank and file, whose achievements will stand comparison with the best soldiers of any age or clime. Nor should the valuable coöperation of the Navy be forgotten—the energy and skill which have placed the United States in the foremost rank of the naval Powers of the world, the ability and heroic zeal of the officers, and the indomitable pluck of our gallant tars. The news which we publish this morning, confirmatory of the glad tidings which has sent a thrill of exultant triumph throughout the land, is the sure precursor of the approaching doom of the rebellion.

"Sherman has made his devastating swath of sixty miles in breadth through the very heart of Georgia, breaking up workshops and factories, destroying stores and supplies, scattering the panic-stricken Legislature, and assuring the Empire State of the South that war is no child's play, and that though it has been long free from its ravages, it is idle to defy the Government of our fathers and to cope with the resources of a people bent on the maintenance of its nationality. He has reached his objective point on the coast. Fort McAllister is in his hands. Savannah is partially invested, and its fate sealed.

"In the mean time General Foster has moved up from Beaufort, has laid devastating hands on the railroad connection with Charleston, and is ready to coöperate with Sherman in an attack on Savannah, while the Navy is moving up its ships and gunboats into Ossabaw sound for like purpose. Further on, in the far South-west, General Canby has dispatched a force from Vicksburg, which has destroyed the bridge over the Big Black river, with thirty miles of the track of the Mississippi Central railroad, twenty-six hundred bales of cotton, and over a hundred and sixty thousand dollars' worth of property, cutting off Hood's connection with Mobile and endangering his supplies.

"Breckinridge has been checked in his demonstrations in Tennessee, by a daring raid under Stowman and Burbridge in his rear, who seized Abingdon, Glade Springs, and other points along the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad, destroying the track and valuable property, and spreading universal consternation among the rebels, and threatening, according to their accounts, their invaluable salt-works at Saltville and vicinity.

"Along the Roanoke a joint land and naval expedition, despite the torpedoes which blew up three of our vessels, are pushing up into the interior, laying waste rebel supplies to the amount of a million dollars and more, and scattering dismay among a people who thought navigation entirely obstructed.

"In Tennessee the gallant Thomas is giving the finishing blows to that grand stroke of the Davis-Hood-Beauregard policy which was to annihilate Sherman and ignominiously expel the Federal troops from the soil of Tennessee. Sherman paid no heed to the vain boast, but pursued his march, leaving the vaunting enemy to the care of Thomas and his gallant men, and right nobly have they done their duty. Falling back, as if under compulsion, Thomas administered a severe check to the enemy at Franklin, and concentrated his lines on the Cumberland. When Hood sent out his detached parties, expecting to flank the old veteran into further retreat, he was suddenly pounced down upon and vanquished. We give his official dispatch this morning. Forrest, too, the chief of the Fort Pillow massacre, is reported as killed.

"While thus from other quarters of the military horizon we are cheered by tidings of success, the army of the Potomac is not idle. The gallant Warren has just returned from a damaging raid upon the Weldon road, and the great leader of our armies is steadily maturing his preparations for the final demonstration against the rebel capital. Its fate may be postponed, but it cannot be averted."

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I do not adopt the term "subjugate" as used by the gentleman from New York but in the last necessity. I heartily concur with our excellent Chief Magistrate in the sentiment embodied in the last paragraph of his message, and commend it especially to the gentleman from New York, and all who may sympathize with him in his efforts to inspire the supporters of a bad cause with confidence:

"In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say, that THE WAR WILL CEASE, ON THE PART OF THE GOVERNMENT, WHENEVER IT SHALL HAVE CEASED ON THE PART OF THOSE WHO BEGAN IT."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FARNSWORTH reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the President's annual message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at ten minutes past three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of A. M. Convey and H. S. Jaudon, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to pay to them a certain amount of money seized by Major General Butler at New Orleans, and remitted by him to the Treasury Department, the same having been previously confiscated in the hands of the Southern Bank of New Orleans, by the rebel government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of Catharine Harleston, praying to be remunerated for damages to her house and furniture, occasioned by the shelling of her house on the Seventh street road, in the District of Columbia, in the month of July last, as is alleged, by order of the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of officers in the subsistence department of the Army, praying that that department may be placed on an equality with the quartermaster's department in respect to promotion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented three petitions of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of their pay and allowances; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Selina Barclay, praying for remuneration for the loss of her property occasioned by the burning of the navy-yard at Portsmouth, Virginia, in April, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of James N. Carpenter, paymaster United States Navy, praying to be compensated for losses sustained by him by reason of the rebellion, in consequence of his absence on duty on board the United States ship Saratoga; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of J. B. Parker and forty others, acting assistant surgeons in the United States Navy, praying for an increase of their pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I have received and been requested to present to the Senate the memorial of Edmund F. Brown, a notary public and United States commissioner of Washington city, asking for the payment of a balance due him by the Interior Department for taking depositions in matters connected with the Washington aqueduct. My own impression is that it should be referred to the Committee on Claims; but it has been transmitted to me with a request to have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. If they, on examination, find that it does not belong to them, they will send it to the Committee on Claims. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I have received, and been requested to present to the Senate, a memorial from Sister Ann Simeon Norris, mother superior of the Sisters of Charity, which represents that by the discipline of their order they are obliged to wear a uniform of a certain description, which is manufactured only in France, and that the duties upon it are now so oppressive that they are not able to receive the importation. They represent that they spend their lives, a great many of them, in gratuitous service in the hospitals, and there are, I believe, some three or four hundred of them who devote their whole time to purposes of charity in the Army. They request that the duties on that material may be remedied. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present the memorial of the board of managers of the Soldiers' National Cemetery Association, asking for a slight appropriation on the part of the Government to aid in the erection of the monument at Gettysburg. As the facts contained in the memorial are very interesting, and the memorial itself is quite brief, I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that permission be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition of Charles Taylor, praying compensation for service rendered and supplies advanced to the United States, at Chicago, Illinois, during the Black Hawk war, in 1832, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims. No report has been made upon the case.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; and that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the resolution proposing an adjournment from the 22d instant to the 5th of January, 1864.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 560) to amend the act of Congress entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Socol Ranch, in the State of California," reported it with amendments.

He, also, from the same committee, to whom were referred various petitions from citizens of California on that subject, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, which was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 354) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in Minnesota, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 33) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City, and Territory of Nevada, for the purposes of a branch mint located in said place, reported it without amendment.

THE RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back to the Senate with an amendment striking out all after the words "joint resolution" and inserting a substitute. I am further directed to ask for the consideration of the resolution to-morrow, and, if the Senate will give me permission, I shall call it up at some convenient moment to-morrow.

The same committee, to whom were referred a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minnesota, remonstrating against any action at the present session of Congress terminating the reciprocity treaty, and also sundry petitions from Connecticut, from Wisconsin, from the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, and sundry other papers on the same subject, having had them under consideration direct me to report them all back to the Senate, with a request to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. FOOT. I desire to present the petitions of a large number of citizens from various towns in the State of Vermont, praying for the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, so called. As that subject has been reported upon this morning by the Committee on Foreign Relations, I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF BONDED GOODS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 603) to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from public stores, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment and to ask that it may be put on its passage at once.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to provide that in computing the three years allowed by the twenty-first section of the "act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, for the withdrawal of goods from any public store or bonded warehouse for exportation to foreign countries or transshipment to any port of the Pacific or western coast of the United States, if such exportation or transshipment of any goods shall, either for the whole or any part of the term of three years, have been prevented by reason of any order of the President of the United States, the time during which such exportation or transshipment shall have been so prevented shall be excluded from the computation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. DIXON. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Washington Gas-Light Company, praying for the repeal of certain amendments to their charter, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report a bill on the subject and to ask for its immediate consideration of the Senate. It is a matter of very great public as well as private importance.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to repeal so much of the acts of June 25, 1860, and July 11, 1862, as relate to the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gas-Light Company, and to amend the act incorporating the company so as to prohibit the company from receiving, on and after December 1, 1864, for the benefit of its stockholders, a greater price for gas than the average net or cash price which may be charged in the capitals of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, and from that price five per cent. is to be deducted on all gas furnished to the General Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that if we are to change the charter of this company we ought to fix definitely the price of the gas consumed. The gas consumed by the Government of the United States now amounts to somewhere between fifty and one hundred thousand dollars per annum; and this bill affects also the price paid by every consumer in the city of Washington. I think all of us are more or less interested in it. If the price now allowed by law is not sufficient, certainly the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to fix the price, and not make it so uncertain as to depend upon the legislation of three or four different States—a standard that no citizen interested in the subject can fix. How would it be possible for a citizen of Washington to know what is the law of these various States? It would be impossible for him to ascertain it. It seems to me, therefore, that if the price allowed is not sufficient, the Committee on the District of Columbia should fix a definite price per thousand feet, and then every citizen will know precisely whether they charge him according to law or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there no limit?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. It is to be fixed, as I understand it, by what is allowed in the capitals of Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York.

Mr. JOHNSON. They charge differently in the cities to which reference is made.

Mr. WILSON. I think we had better not pass this bill this morning. Let us have a little time to reflect upon it and to inquire into it. It seems to me, however, that some action ought to be had not only in regard to the price, but especially in regard to the quality of the gas. The quality of the gas of this city is of the very poorest description. Everybody sees it, feels it, tastes it, and smells it. I think we had better let the bill lie over, and we shall probably hear something about it in a few days and can make the bill what it ought to be; but I am sure that some action ought to be had in regard to this matter of gas in this city.

Mr. DIXON. I have a letter here from the secretary of the company with regard to the quality of the gas, and I may as well, perhaps, allude to that, as the Senator from Massachusetts has referred to it. It is true that about one week ago there was a very great defect in the character of the gas, which was probably perceived by every person who had occasion to use it; but I believe, with that exception, there has been no complaint. The secretary of the company, Mr. Brown, wrote me a note in regard to that, which I will read to the Senate. He says:

OFFICE OF THE WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY,
No. 483 TENTH STREET WEST,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 19, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Last week we received a cargo of coal from Nova Scotia, out of the Glace bay mines, from which there has been sent us about a thousand tons in 1864, all good coal, such as is used in Boston and other eastern cities. Being scarce of coal we commenced using it at once, and did not observe the unpleasant odor of the gas until we had carbonized some fifty tons; it was immediately stopped as soon as discovered, but one hundred and seventy-five thousand feet of the gas had passed into the holders and affected the whole supply for forty-eight hours. This coal cost more than the coal from West Virginia, and nearly as much as that from Pittsburgh, and was only ordered because we could not get our winter supply from the United States. This company has always furnished purer and better gas than was used any other place, and it is our intention to do so regardless of the cost of coal, as long as we can furnish any at all. The cargo of coal referred to will not be used for manufacturing gas, and every care will be taken to prevent the production of an article of the character complained of.

I am, &c., J. F. BROWN, Secretary, &c.
Hon. JAMES DIXON, United States Senator.

That is with regard to the quality of the gas. Now, as to the question of postponing this matter, I will state to the Senate, and I think the Senate will see, that immediate or at least early action is required on this subject, after hearing the facts.

On the 25th of June, 1860, a bill was passed limiting the price of gas to be furnished by this company to $3 50 per thousand feet. In 1862 an amendment was adopted to an appropriation bill limiting the company to $2 80 per thousand feet to the Government and $3 to other consumers, with ten per cent. deducted, leaving the price to be paid by the Government $2 52, which is now paid, and by other consumers $2 70. It is perfectly obvious that, with the present price of coal and the present price of labor, it is utterly impossible for this company to furnish the public with gas at these rates. They are, as the committee were informed and believe, at this time actually losing a very large sum of money monthly. They have not made a dividend for eighteen months, and they will not only make no dividends hereafter, at the present prices, but the committee were satisfied they would be compelled to abandon their works, and perhaps give them up to the Government, and the Government will be compelled to furnish its own gas, which we believe could not be furnished at this time at a price less than six dollars per thousand.

Now, sir, this company present their bills monthly. They must present their bills at the commencement of the next month, and if no action is had now the subject must go over, and they will be compelled by the Government to furnish gas for another month at a losing rate. It does not seem to me that that is just or right.

As to the objection of the Senator from Ohio, the committee would have preferred to fix a certain rate of price; but they found it very difficult to do so in consequence of the fact that materials and labor are constantly rising. It would be impossible for the committee to say what would now and six months hence, and perhaps a year hence, be a fair price. It was therefore thought if we adopted as a criterion for the price, the price in several cities where coal is twenty or thirty per cent. cheaper always than here, as in Harrisburg, Trenton, and Annapolis, that that would be a fair rate, and then there would be no occasion for this company to come to Congress again and ask that the limitation be removed. Still, if the Senate prefer to fix a rate, of course the committee would have no objection to it; but the reason why they adopted this mode was that it seemed difficult at this time to fix a rate which would be just at a future time as well as just now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow. The committee that have had this bill under consideration doubtless are quite familiar with all the facts connected with it, but it is manifest that a majority of the Senators present are not; and it is not unreasonable, I think, that it should go over a few days until we can become somewhat acquainted with the facts. I believe this company has a monopoly of this whole business in the city of Washington, and if so, we ought to be a little careful in our legislation.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator is mistaken; that is not so. Another company has been chartered, and has the privilege at any time of laying down pipes and supplying gas.

Mr. HARLAN. But practically at this time this company furnishes all the gas consumed in Washington.

Mr. DIXON. They do so at this time.

Mr. GRIMES. The other company has forfeited its charter.

Mr. HARLAN. My colleague remarks that the other company has forfeited its charter, so that this company has a monopoly of the whole business. The legislation on the subject, therefore, I think, ought to be prudent and careful. I think it is probable that the price of gas ought to be increased, but we ought to be well informed on the subject before legislation is had. I hope, therefore, that the bill may go over for a few days.

Mr. DIXON. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that here is an existing law compelling this company to furnish gas at a price at which they cannot afford to do it. When that fact is considered, it seems to me that is a reason why the subject should not be delayed. They merely ask a repeal of the restriction upon them. Is it just or right, I ask the Senate, to compel this company to furnish gas at a rate at which we all know they cannot afford to do it?

Mr. HENDERSON. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, when this proposition was laid before it, I took some pains to ascertain what charge the proposed bill would make. I did not know that the bill would be called up this morning. The bill under consideration proposes to allow this company to charge the average price of gas in Annapolis, Trenton, Albany, and Harrisburg. When the bill was first presented I was unable to ascertain the price of gas in Trenton and Albany. I have since that time ascertained it. I knew the price of gas in the other two cities. I find that in Annapolis it is $4 50 per thousand feet; at Trenton, $4; at Albany, $3 80; and at Harrisburg, $3 50. The average price, therefore, if we pass this bill, would be $3 95 per thousand feet in the city of Washington. We now allow the gas company $2 80. Hence the passage of the bill will involve an increase of price of $1 15 per thousand feet. That is just exactly the bill that is now before the Senate.

I have before me a statement of the price of gas in the various cities of the Union. It varies very much. In a great many places the price is higher than the proposed price here, and in a great many others it is a great deal lower. For instance, at Augusta, Maine, it is $5 15; at Portland, $3 61; at Manchester, New Hampshire, $4; at Portsmouth, $4 46; at Boston, Massachusetts, $2 75; at Providence, Rhode Island, $4; at Newport, $4 30; at Hartford, Connecticut, $3 80; at Burlington, Vermont, $6 50; at Buffalo, New York, $3 50; at Syracuse, $4; at Troy, $3 80; at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, $1 60; at Wilmington, Delaware, $3 30; at Baltimore, $3, &c.

The Senate will see at once what change this bill will make if it should be passed. It will be an increase of $1 15 per thousand feet. I am satisfied that if the prices I have read be but a fair remuneration for furnishing gas in the other cities of the Union, the price ought to be increased here. I do not know whether that remuneration is but a fair remuneration or not. That is for the Senate to judge. Certainly the price of gas is as high as we propose to make it here in a great many cities of the Union where coal and labor can be furnished much more cheaply than they can be in Washington. At other points, again, it seems to me it is lower where it should be really higher than here. It is for the Senate to determine the matter. I do not know much about this subject, but before I consented to the reporting of this bill I felt it to be my duty to look into the matter, so that Senators might be apprised of the true state of the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

VICE ADMIRAL.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 358) to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy, to report the same back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I move that the Senate proceed, by unanimous consent, to the consideration of the bill now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one vice admiral who is to be selected from the list of active rear admirals, and who is to be the ranking officer in the Navy of the United States, and whose relative rank with the officers of the Army is to be that of lieutenant general in the Army.

The second section provides that the pay of the vice admiral of the Navy shall be $7,000 when at sea; $6,000 when on shore duty; and $5,000 when waiting orders.

The third section provides that the section of an act approved December 21, 1861, entitled "An act further to promote the efficiency of the Navy," shall not be so construed as to apply to any one holding a commission as a vice admiral in the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOSTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 365) in relation to pensions; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 364) to increase the number of cadets in and to raise the standard of admission to the Military Academy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of requiring all residents of the District of Columbia to take and file with the provost marshal of said District an oath of allegiance or fidelity to the United States similar to the oath required by law of members and Senators in Congress and other officers of the Government, and also the expediency and propriety of prohibiting all persons from doing business in said District or with the several Departments of the Government who have not or may not take and file such oath; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not one of those who believe that the increase of oaths by citizens promotes either individual or public virtue, and I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it will lie over under the rule.

LAND SALES IN KANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to communicate to the Senate as to the quantity of land which has been actually sold under the provisions of the fourth and fifth articles of the treaty made by the United States with the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi, October 1, A. D. 1839, and ratified July 9, A. D. 1860; the price per acre at which said lands were sold; what opportunity the people of Kansas have had to compete in the purchase of the same; whether any bids are now on file in the Interior Department for the purchase of any portions of said lands; if so, then for what amount of land, and whether at a price above or below the appraised value of said lands; if any of said lands have been sold, what was received for them, money or scrip; if scrip, then what kind of scrip; if any bids for the purchase of any of said lands are now before the Department, what is it proposed by the Department to receive in pay for lands on said bids, money or scrip; if scrip, then what kind of scrip; was the land already sold purchased by citizens of Kansas or speculators; and also to communicate to the Senate any and all other information the said Secretary of the Interior may have as to the sale of said lands, and the probability of selling the same so as to pay therefrom the indebtedness of the said Indians.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. WILKINSON. I offer the following resolution:

Whereas the large number of officers and enlisted men belonging to the armies of the United States who are now held as prisoners of war by our enemies are being treated in the most cruel and barbarous manner, deprived of necessary food and clothing, often left exposed to the weather without fuel, blankets, or clothing, or even a shelter over them; and whereas from such inhuman treatment thousands of our brave soldiers have died from starvation and unnecessary exposure, while thousands who survive are from their extreme sufferings wholly unable to render further service in the Army; and whereas every possible effort has been made by the Government and people of the United States to induce the rebel authorities to pursue a more humane policy toward these prisoners and to relieve their sufferings, which efforts have been of no avail, while on the other hand supplies of food and clothing which have been forwarded to them have seldom reached their destination but have been appropriated to the use of the enemy, thus proving that the rebel authorities not only refused to feed and clothe our soldiers themselves, but they refuse to let the Government or the people of the United States do so: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of Congress it would be wise and proper for the Secretary of War to direct that the rations, clothing, and supplies to be furnished to the rebel prisoners in our hands be limited in amount and kind to those furnished by the rebel authorities to Union troops held by them as prisoners of war, and that they be treated in all respects as the Union prisoners are treated by the rebel authorities.

I should like to have the resolution put upon its passage this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it must lie over.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish to say a word or two in regard to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I waive the objection.

Mr. WILKINSON. It is well understood throughout the country, and has been for nearly two years, that the Union soldiers, officers and enlisted men, have been treated in the most barbarous and inhuman manner by the rebel authorities. The Government of the United States, on the other hand, have not retaliated, but have endeavored to get through supplies and medicines, and the Sanitary Commission and the Christian Commission have been at work and have endeavored to alleviate or relieve the sufferings of our soldiers who are prisoners in the South. Through the negotiations of the Government every effort has been made to induce the rebel authorities to pursue a different policy in regard to the treatment of our soldiers, until it has become apparent to my mind that their principal object is to reduce these men by suffering, by starvation, by inhuman and barbarous treatment, to so low a physical condition that it will be utterly impossible for them hereafter ever to enter into the service of the United States in the Army, while on the other hand the Government of the United States have been pursuing the course which all enlightened Christian nations pursue in the treatment of captives which are held by them as prisoners of war.

The other night I met the assistant adjutant general upon the staff of the brave and gallant General Custer, who was taken prisoner in September last, and was taken to Columbia, South Carolina, on the 7th day of October, 1864, and he told me that fifteen hundred officers were placed upon an area of five acres of ground one third of which was swamp, without any shelter; that his coat, boots, blanket, and everything of that kind were taken from him, and they were placed in this stockade without axes, without shovels, even without anything to cook their rations or to provide them the least shelter. For two weeks they could not obtain an ax even to cut wood with which to cook their rations, and after that time six axes and some few shovels were distributed among those fifteen hundred officers, which enabled them, by combining their efforts, to get a little wood to cook their food, and by the use of the shovels to dig some holes in the dirt where they could lie in the night and be somewhat protected from the October frost. He also stated that in the months of July and August the deaths at Andersonville, for he was afterwards at Andersonville, from starvation and suffering were eight thousand out of thirty-five thousand prisoners, and the number of deaths which have occurred at Andersonville, through the inhumanity, the barbarism of the rebel authorities, is thirteen thousand four hundred and eighty. When he was brought to the city of Charleston to be exchanged in company with Captain E. M. Lee, of the fifth Michigan cavalry—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause; it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday, Senate joint resolution No. 82.

Mr. WILSON. Let that be passed over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be laid aside informally.

Mr. WILKINSON. When he came to Charleston to be transferred to the receiving ship, the City of New York, he came in company with Captain E. M. Lee, of the fifth Michigan cavalry. The rebel steamer Celt came down the harbor, and while they were transferring the Union prisoners to the Union boat, the City of New York, there were eleven dead men: they were either dead before they were carried over the plank from one boat to another, or they died immediately after being laid upon the deck of the City of New York. A newspaper in the city of Columbia, South Carolina, published an article about the time of the exchange of those prisoners, wherein it boasted that the Union prisoners held by them which were sent North and exchanged would never render any more service for the cause of the Union and the cause of their country; and it also stated that the prisoners which were held by the United States and exchanged for those prisoners who had been physically destroyed, were in good condition to enter the rebel service at once.

I know that southern people have sometimes made misrepresentations respecting our treatment of prisoners from their armies, and hence, in addition to the testimony of the editor of a South Carolina paper, to which I have just referred, it may be proper that I should quote a few lines from a work now before me which furnishes the testimony of a well-known philanthropic lady:

"Point Lookout was still another post which had been subjected to the rebel statement that the prisoners there suffered from cruelty and neglect. Miss Dix, who visited those very prisoners, sufficiently disposes of the slander. She says: 'They were supplied with vegetables, with the best wheat bread, and fresh and salt meat three times daily in abundant measure—the full Government ration.'

"In the camp of about nine thousand rebel prisoners there were but four hundred reported to the surgeon. Of these one hundred were confined to their beds, thirty were very sick, and perhaps fifteen or twenty would never recover."

"The hospital food consisted of beef tea, beef soup, rice, milk punch, milk, gruel, lemonade, stewed fruits, beef-steak, vegetables, and mutton. White sugar was employed in cooking. The supplies were, in fact, more ample and abundant than in hospitals where our own men were under treatment."

"The surgeons of the various hospitals, in several instances, alluded to the excellent condition of the prisoners when discharged and exchanged; and in the statement of Miss Dix will be found a brief description of their appearance when leaving the flag-of-truce boat for their own lines: 'All were in vigorous health, equipped in clothes furnished by the United States Government, many of them with blankets and haversacks.'"

Now, Mr. President, this thing has gone too far. It may not be right for us to starve their men because they starve ours, for retaliation merely. I think the laws of war would justify a course of retaliation on the part of our Government; still, perhaps the higher law of Christian civilization would not justify it upon the ground of retaliation alone; but while we are exchanging these prisoners and turning over ten thousand healthy men to enter their armies at once to fight against the cause of this Union, they are sending back in their places ten thousand men physically destroyed, ten thousand men who can render no service to the Union and to the cause of the country. Therefore, in a double sense, the Government of the United States should teach these men that this thing can go on no longer. For the purpose of preventing them from gaining an advantage over us in the field, and giving them the power of strengthening their armies, while ours are not strengthened at all, and also for the purpose of protecting, as far as we are able to do, the brave men who have been fighting for the cause of their country, I think that this course ought to be adopted, and that there should be no delay in regard to the policy which this Government should adopt. I ask the Senate to take up my resolution and act upon it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands objection to be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is still made.

Mr. WILKINSON afterwards moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and the objection to the consideration of the resolution being withdrawn, the motion to refer was agreed to.

ARRESTS IN KENTUCKY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday, will now be taken up.

Mr. POWELL. I move to postpone all pending and prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday calling for information as to the arrest and imprisonment of Lieutenant Governor Jacobs and Colonel Wolford of Kentucky.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that will not be done.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. POWELL asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. What is the resolution? Let it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. POWELL, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all information in his possession bearing on the arrest and imprisonment of Colonel Richard T. Jacobs, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Kentucky, and Colonel Frank Wolford, one of the presidential electors of that State; particularly by whose order they were arrested and imprisoned, where they are at present confined, and what offenses are charged against them.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to say only a word. I had not supposed that such a resolution as this would meet with opposition in the Senate of the United States. It simply proposes an inquiry concerning the arrest and imprisonment of two citizens of the United States, both of them well known to be strong Union men. Both of them have served in the Army of the United States with distinguished honor. Both of them have been more than once wounded in conflict at the front. They were both soldiers of distinguished ability. They were active friends of General McClellan at the last presidential election. Both canvassed the State of Kentucky to a considerable extent. Soon after the election, without any cause known to their friends, they were arrested, and without any trial, placed in prison. Colonel Wolford, I understand, is closely confined at Covington, Kentucky. It is not known where Lieutenant Governor Jacobs is. He seems to have been spirited away in some manner or other. I saw three days ago a telegraphic dispatch to one of my colleagues, from the Governor of Kentucky, which said that Colonel Wolford was confined at Covington, and that it was not known where Lieutenant Governor Jacobs was.

This resolution simply asks the President by what authority they were arrested, and where they are. It strikes me that such a gross violation of all the rights of the citizen should not be passed idly by in this body. I can see no possible objection to the passage of the resolution. If these gentlemen have committed any crime, if they have been guilty of the violation of any law, let them be brought before the legal tribunals and tried and punished. But that citizens, civilians, for they are now both out of the Army, one of them holding the second office in the gift of the people of Kentucky, should be arrested without warrant and without charge, and thrown into prison, in my judgment is the grossest violation of the rights of an American citizen; and we, at least, should pass a resolution asking the cause of the arrest, and the charges upon which it was made, and by whom it was done. We know that they were arrested by the military authorities there, but for what they were arrested we are profoundly ignorant.

I trust, sir, that Senators in favor of the Administration will not longer think that they can promote the interest of their party and their country by allowing the rights of citizens thus to be trampled down. There is no man who can truthfully say that either Colonel Wolford or Lieutenant Governor Jacobs is not loyal to the Constitution and the Union of these States. No man can say that either of them is friendly to the rebellion. They have both, publicly and privately, on all occasions denounced the rebellion, and they have by the most gallant achievements in the field shown that they are devoted to the flag and to the Union. That such men as these should be seized and imprisoned without warrant and without trial is a disgrace to the American people. That Lieutenant Governor Jacobs should be thus arrested and taken away and imprisoned, so that none of his friends in the State know where he is, is certainly disgraceful to those who have thus treated him. We desire to know by whose authority these gentlemen were arrested; we desire to know the offenses laid to their charge; and we desire further, and I know that these two noble and gallant soldiers desire, if they have committed any offense, to be brought face to face with their accusers and to be allowed to answer the charges against them. All that their friends ask for them is that before they shall be deprived of their liberty they shall know the cause, and that they shall be brought before some legally-constituted tribunal and there tried in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and laws of their country. There is no man in America, I trust, who desires that these citizens shall languish in prison if they are innocent; and on the other hand, if they have violated any law of the land, there is none who desires them to be free from that punishment which the law inflicts, provided it be inflicted in a lawful manner.

I am amazed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] objects to the taking up of this resolution. There is certainly nothing in it to which a man who loves civil liberty should object. Why is it that you desire that citizens of their position and standing, who have shed their blood on many battle-fields in this strife under the Union flag, should be deprived of their liberty and their rights, and one of them taken whither his friends know not? Why do you desire that the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, should not answer such a resolution as this, and say to the Senate where they are and for what they have been arrested?

I say again that I am amazed that the Senator from Massachusetts, or any other Senator, should object to the passage of this resolution. I hope it may be passed, as it certainly ought to be. The Senate owes it to itself to pass the resolution, and let the President answer and give us the information if he has it. It may be, and I believe the fact is, that some of the subordinates of the President have done this thing, perhaps without his knowledge or connivance. If so, let the matter be investigated, and let those guilty violators of the law be punished, for whoever arrested these gentlemen and treated them in this way is certainly a guilty violator of the laws of the land.

It was not my purpose to say a word on this subject, and I should not have said anything now if it had not been for the indication which was manifested to give the resolution the go-by, and not allow it to be passed.

Mr. WILSON. I assure the Senator from Kentucky that I have no objection to acting on his resolution, other than this: we have now pending before us what I regard as a very important bill, to make free the wives and children of the soldiers of the Republic; and I do not wish to displace that bill, which is the order of the day, by taking up this resolution, which may as well be taken up at any other time. That is the reason why I made the objection. Now, however, as the Senator has made his motion, and it is before us, I am ready and willing to take the vote on the resolution; but I propose first to amend it by inserting after the word "Senate" the words, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest." I have no doubt that the President will be disposed to regard the request of the Senate; but it may be that the public interest may require that all the facts should not go to the country. If the resolution be taken up and amended in this way, I shall have no objection to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the prior orders and proceeding to the consideration of the resolution indicated by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WILSON. If there be no objection, let the order of the day be passed over informally to take action on the resolution.

Mr. POWELL. I am willing to do that; I do not wish to displace the order of the day; and I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, if I am at liberty to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays were ordered by the Senate; the order may be withdrawn by unanimous consent. ["Agreed!"] The call is withdrawn. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate on the motion now before it more than a moment; but I must confess that I see no necessity for the passage of the resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. What would he have us do? Does he propose to convert the Senate into a sort of inquisition to use its power in the enforcement of inquiries into matters which pertain, I may say exclusively, to the Executive? Does he intend to use the power of this body to make inquiry into the nature of criminal prosecutions that have been instituted or that may hereafter be instituted against persons offending against the military laws of the United States, or against persons who are in league with the enemy, against spies or any other class of public enemies?

It seems to me that the honorable Senator from Kentucky may very properly take it for granted that there must be some prima facie evidence of criminality against these gentlemen whose names appear in his resolution. He can, I think, without any extraordinary stretch of his charity, believe that the military authorities who have occasioned these arrests have proceeded upon reasonable and sufficient grounds. He cannot presume, as it appears to me, although he seems so to presume, that these arrests are entirely without cause, flagrant and wanton. And, sir, I object to the taking up of such a resolution as this, for the very reason that it is expending the time of the Senate upon a subject-matter in which we can do nothing, and in reference to which I do not understand that the Senator from Kentucky has offered any bill, or is preparing to bring in any measure of legislation to remedy the evil of which he complains. I move, Mr. President, if it be in order, to lay the whole subject on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The Chair would suggest that there is nothing now to lay on the table, the motion being to take up the resolution. The resolution itself is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, a gentleman who comes here accredited from the State of Kentucky as the representative of that State, rises in his place and says that two eminent men of that State have been arrested, he knows not by whom, he knows not for what purpose they were arrested, and he knows not whether they have been taken; and as a representative of that State he asks the Senate of the United States to institute an inquiry that it may be learned by the people of that State what disposition has been made of them. Now I say, sir, that it is the right and the duty of this Senate to give to the Senator from Kentucky the answer that he demands. We are not going to institute judicial proceedings, as the Senator from Michigan seems to indicate; we are not going to pursue any illegitimate or improper inquiry. The Senator from Kentucky representing his State says that two men in that State have been arrested, and he knows not for what they have been arrested. He says that they have been spirited away, and he knows not whether they have been carried. Is it not our duty to make some inquiry in regard to a question of that kind? Are we going to be entirely indifferent to the liberties of the people of this country? I am not sent here, Mr. President, for the purpose of sitting with my arms folded in silence and in quiet, and giving no vote in favor of an inquiry of this kind. I have no doubt that when the inquiry shall be pursued properly there will be a perfect vindication of the officers of the Government; I have no sort of question that these men were properly arrested, and after the statements that have been made here by the Senator from Kentucky, I am anxious that his resolution shall be adopted in order that they may be thoroughly vindicated, and I am satisfied that the inquiry will vindicate them; but if it be otherwise, if these men have been improperly arrested, then it is the duty of the Senate to say so, and to put its seal of reprobation upon those who have thus improperly arrested them.

Mr. President, I trust that this Senate is not going to sit quietly by and, when charges are made here by a Senator representing a State, of arbitrary conduct on the part of any of the officers of this Government, refuse to make any inquiry because it is claimed that to do so would be a proceeding of a quasi judicial character. It is one of the prerogatives of this body to protect the liberties of the people of the States and the rights and interests of the States themselves.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am well acquainted with both of the gentlemen who have been arrested; they are both strictly and eminently loyal to the country and to the Government; they both have commanded regiments in the service of the United States in the war to put down this rebellion, and Colonel Wolford served out the term of three years. In the course of his service he has been in upward of three hundred battles and skirmishes; he has received six wounds. He has by his command, the first Kentucky regiment of cavalry, captured more prisoners than any other command of the same strength in the war. He has rendered more service, and successful service, in enlisting soldiers in the Union Army than any man in the State of Kentucky, or, I believe, in the United States. There is no man more firm or unyielding in his support of the war, or in his opposition to and determination to put down this rebellion, than Colonel Wolford. I am at a loss myself to know where he is. I met with a gentleman who was with him in the car between Lexington and Covington, after his arrest, and when he was taken on in the custody of soldiers. He was not allowed to communicate with counsel; he was not allowed to communicate with a friend; he was not allowed to interchange a solitary word with any individual upon the car. I have been informed since that he is in utter ignorance of the cause of his last arrest, and that there have been no charges or complaints of offense or crime made or filed against him to justify that arrest. When he was arrested, he had been elected an elector for the State of Kentucky, for the State at large, in the presidential election. He was arrested without charge, without offense, much less without warrant or process, dragged forcibly from his residence, deprived of the opportunity of performing his legal office as an elector of the State of Kentucky, in casting the vote of that State; carried into imprisonment, where he is now secretly held, and no man, as far as I can learn, has been informed of any charge of any offense against the laws or against military rule or military orders that he has committed.

Now, sir, in relation to Colonel Jacobs: he raised a regiment of mounted men and served twelve months in the war. Both of them have served out their time and have received honorable discharges. Colonel Jacobs was in many battles; he was wounded two or three times; his blood flowed in this cause to support the authority of the Government of the United States. In addition to holding the office of colonel and discharging its duties with signal courage and ability on the battle-field, he also held the civil office of Lieutenant Governor of that State, and as such he presides over the Senate of the State of Kentucky. That Legislature is to convene on the first Wednesday in January. As my colleague has well remarked, this man was arrested under the same circumstances that Colonel Wolford was. He was dragged from his residence, he was denied all communication with friends or counsel or countrymen, and has been spirited away, and now is, nobody in Kentucky knows where.

That men of the character of these two gentlemen, holding their official positions, faithful and true to the Government and to the war, and who have rendered such signal and eminent service in the war, should be arrested under such circumstances, is one of the strangest among the strange features of this strange day; and, sir, when their case is brought before the Senate of the United States by resolution, in the terms offered by my colleague, simply asking of the Executive for information in relation to their arrest, by whose authority it was made, the charges or offenses that they had committed, their whereabouts at this time, that the Senate should pause an instant in passing a resolution asking for such information, is stranger than the arrest and the imprisonment themselves. Sir, if any two negroes in America were arrested under the same circumstances and in the same manner, and were held in secret confinement as these two eminent men and patriots have been and still are, this Senate, a majority of its members, at least, would be glowing with the most virtuous indignation at the enormity of such acts, and would denounce, as they ought to denounce, any attempt to suppress all information in relation to the fact of arrest, the cause of arrest, and the place where the persons arrested were still held in imprisonment.

Sir, I trust that the resolution will pass. In our party zeal, in our efforts to sustain or to oppose this Administration, are we to lose all sense of human right, and of the liberty of the citizen? Are we to become demented by passion, or prejudice, or fury? Sir, a case could not be presented on the part of any individual, however humble, whether black or white, imprisoned under such circumstances, asking information in the terms of this resolution, that I would not feel it my especial and sacred duty to vote for. In asking for the passage of this resolution, we are not asserting the liberty of these two citizens alone, nor that of the white man alone, but we are attempting to uphold and to assert the universal liberty of the people of the United States. It would be monstrous, one of the strangest and most iniquitous exhibitions that the world has ever presented, if men arrested as these have been are still to be held in imprisonment, and no information, no light whatever, be thrown upon their arrest, its cause, or the place of their imprisonment. I hope that the resolution will pass.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I beg leave to say that for one I do not believe the universal liberty of the citizens of the United States depends at all upon a resolution of the Senate, and therefore I do not believe with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] that it is any part of our duty as a Senate to vindicate the liberty of the citizens of the United States. I understand that the liberties of the citizens of the United States are already provided for and guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and the laws which have been passed in accordance with that Constitution, and I believe that those liberties are entirely secure under those guarantees, and therefore I do not think that the passage or the defeat of this resolution will add anything to or abstract anything from the measure of the liberty we enjoy. Nevertheless I entirely concur in the advice that is given by the Senator from Iowa, and by the Senator from Massachusetts, that this resolution had better be passed since we are invited to pass it—not because any citizen of Kentucky will be safer after it is passed, or any citizen of any other State, but because it is said that certain citizens of the United States have been arrested and certain friends of theirs would like to know, they tell us, why they have been arrested, and if the resolution be amended as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the President of the United States, supposing he has any information upon the point, is notified that he is to consult the public interests before giving that information, I am entirely willing that he should be called upon to inform the friends of these gentlemen what is the occasion of their arrest.

It is said that that arrest is contrary to law. If it be so, what resolution of the Senate will make the arrest any more illegal? I do understand that the President of the United States, and every officer commanding in any department of the service, civil or military or naval, is bound by the laws of the United States; that he is a mere agent of the people acting within the sphere prescribed to him by existing law, and when he steps outside of those limits he is without any protection in whatever he does, just as much as if any one of ourselves, or any private citizen, did an act which transcended the laws of the land. But it is not for us to vindicate or enforce those laws. It is for us, in conjunction with other tribunals, to enact them. When they are once enacted, it is for very different and distinct tribunals to enforce and to apply them; and if we undertake to do these things, if we undertake to vindicate instead of declare, to protect by specific action the liberties of the citizen instead of declaring what shall be the liberties and the rights of the citizen, we are usurpers as plainly and as clearly as it is said that those who have made these arrests are usurpers. If, therefore, it were conceded that these arrests were illegal, I really think it would not become the Senate of the United States to call upon the parties making the arrests to state why they had done it, or state the fact of their having done it, for thus we should make them criminate themselves if we had the power to enforce obedience to our resolution, and I do not understand that our laws require any man to criminate himself, either upon a resolution of the Senate or upon an order of a court.

But, because I do not believe this resolution if passed will call for any confession of guilt whatever, and because I am entirely willing that the friends of these gentlemen should be told the cause of their arrest, I think, as has been said by other Senators, we had better let the resolution pass. I believe myself it would have been vastly better if the country had been told specifically in the case of every arrest what the cause of it was. I do not assert that positively, because I do not know that it would not have resulted in laying before the country the story of so much conspiracy, the story of so much plotting, the story of so much of the most cowardly kind of treason that the world has ever witnessed, as would have done more to appall the country than all the open and declared treason, all the avowed and armed treason which we have been called upon to witness. There would have been just that mischief. That it would have laid before the country a vast amount of rottenness I do not doubt, from the little I know myself; but whether it was better to expose the whole or to keep part of it back, I shall not undertake to say; but believing in the sobriety, the wisdom, the integrity, and the purity of the American people as I do, and as all men ought to do after witnessing their action during the last summer, I am inclined to think that it would have been better to tell the whole story and let them see the truth for themselves. I think they would have known how to meet it and deal with it. We have not done this heretofore. My own private opinion is that we had better begin to do it now. So I think it is better to pass this resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise merely to express the wish that this resolution may be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the resolution has not yet been taken up.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, that it may be taken up and passed, I desire simply to make a remark. Either these two gentlemen have been properly or improperly arrested, as was very appropriately stated by the Senator from Iowa. If they have been arrested for cause, I apprehend that the President will be perfectly able to send the reasons to the Senate; and in doing that he will be able to satisfy the members of this body who are now dissatisfied, and in all probability a large number who are dissatisfied in the country in consequence of arrests for which no reasons are given.

Then, Mr. President, there can be no harm provided the arrests have been made for cause; but suppose, on the other hand, that these arrests have been made without any cause. I apprehend that the Senate has some right to speak; and if it should so turn out, as I have no idea it will turn out, because I do not believe these arrests have been made without sufficient cause, let us remember that the very same rule may be applied to any one of us tomorrow. If these gentlemen have been arrested without cause may not I be arrested, may not any member of this body be arrested and thrown into prison and there kept during the residue of this war? Why not?

I say the Senate has a perfect right to speak; and why should we not do so? How can it injure the Union cause to pass a resolution of this character? I apprehend that it will give pleasure to the President to assure the Senate that he has made these arrests for some cause and for some sufficient reason, if they have been made in consequence of orders from him. I live in a country where arrests are very frequently made, and where they are properly made, and where, unless they were made, every Union man in the State, in all probability, would be in danger of losing his life. I am not, therefore, so easily touched about arrests; I know the necessity for them; but I believe that in my own State thousands and thousands of arrests have been made during this war that have done the Union cause an injury, and have done no good whatever. I am satisfied of it. Men are taken and thrown into prison; kept there perhaps for two or three weeks, and their friends and relatives create a very great disturbance in their respective neighborhoods, allege the fact that they have been Union men all the time, and that without cause or reason they have been thrown into the military bastilles of the country. It creates very great sympathy for the party who is imprisoned, and it does the Union cause, in the long run, no good whatever. They are generally kept for a short time and turned loose again, and then they are lionized in the community to a very great extent.

In my impression, the best way to treat the resolution, now that it is before us, is to pass it, and let us ascertain the cause of these arrests. As I have stated, it can do nobody any harm, and it may do a great deal of good.

Mr. President, if there is one thing throughout this broad land to-day that is interfering in a moral point of view with the prosecution of the present war, it is a belief on the part of a great many people that unlawful, illegal, and improper arrests are being indulged in to too great an extent. I do not say that such is the case, but we know that there is a great feeling pervading the country on that subject and in that direction. Now, I think that it is high time, it is the proper time, for us to look into it. It certainly cannot offend the President to ask him to give his reasons for the arrests. These are not men taken in arms; they are men who have performed distinguished service in defense of the country; they are citizens living at home, and one of them is an elector who has been chosen by his State to cast her electoral vote, and I presume in all probability he has not been able to cast the electoral vote of the State.

Mr. POWELL. That is so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not vote for General McClellan, and were it to be done over again I should vote as I did before, for Mr. Lincoln; but, sir, Kentucky had a right to vote for George B. McClellan if she desired to do so. Now, although every member of this body knows that it is not the desire of the Administration to arrest any man to prevent his casting his vote for its opponents, such charges may be made. I am satisfied that no such feeling actuates the President, and I further feel almost convinced that the President has not ordered these arrests, but they have been made by the military authorities without his knowledge and without his consent. Now, sir, would it not be better, under the circumstances, to let the resolution pass, and let us understand why these men have been arrested?

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to take up the time of the Senate, and I shall now say but a word or two. I desire to return my thanks to the honorable Senator from Iowa for the speech that he has made. The speech of that Senator, in my judgment, was certainly well-timed, and he spoke as a Senator of the United States should speak when the constitutional and civil liberties of the people are involved. I would, sir, that the feelings which animate that Senator animated this whole body; and on the part of my State, and of these two distinguished and gallant soldiers who now languish in prison, I thank him for his speech.

I was amazed at the position taken by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Wisconsin, when they indicated that this is a kind of judicial proceeding which we are instituting here. I have always supposed, sir, that it was within the province of the Senate of the United States to inquire into the actions and doings of the officers of this Government when they are charged with casting down the liberty of the citizen. I thought that it was one of our prerogatives, and, indeed, a duty imperative upon every Senator and every Representative of the people, to inquire into such transactions. I do not suppose these gentlemen were arrested by order of the President of the United States; but whether or not I am right in that supposition I do not certainly know. They were undoubtedly arrested by the military authorities in Kentucky. I hope, and I believe, that the President of the United States gave no special order for their arrest; but about that I may be mistaken. Those who made the arrest were officers of the Government of the United States; the President is Commander-in-Chief of the armies and is their superior. We certainly have the right, in defense of the liberty of the citizen, to inquire of him why men have been wrongfully and unlawfully deprived of their liberty by his subordinates. We owe at least that much to the liberty of the citizen; we owe it to ourselves as a legislative body, because when the President shall state the facts, if it shall appear from that statement that these officers of the Government have transcended their authority, and have, without constitutional or legal warrant, trampled upon the civil liberty of the citizen, it may then be our duty by legislation to apply the corrective and to pass laws punishing those who thus trample on the dearest rights of freemen.

The Senator from Wisconsin says he is not so much in favor of "universal liberty," perhaps, as my colleague. I had supposed that that gentleman was very much in favor of universal liberty.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator misunderstood me if he understood me to make any such remark.

Mr. POWELL. I stand corrected.

Mr. HOWE. Universal liberty is a pet of mine.

Mr. POWELL. I was about, however, to reply to the Senator that perhaps his sentiments would be a little governed by this consideration: if some of his friends were arrested, he might change his notions. The Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Iowa, and others have said that they believe that when the facts shall be made known to us by his Excellency the President, the military authorities will be vindicated for these arrests. That may be, but I do not think it will be so. I believe that these gentlemen have been arrested wrongfully. They were certainly arrested without warrant as prescribed in the Constitution and laws of their country, and I know them well enough to know that if they are charged with any crime or offense, all they want is to be brought before a legally-constituted tribunal and tried. As a personal and political friend of Lieutenant Governor Jacobs and Colonel Wolford, I court the investigation. They are Christian gentlemen; they are men of ability; they are men of honor; they are brave men, and they have attested their valor on many a well-fought battlefield. Such men cannot be guilty of crime; and I will say here for them, as their friend and as their representative, that all they ask is to meet their accusers face to face. If they are charged with any offense, take them before the constituted tribunals of the land, try them, and, if they do not make their innocence manifest, punish them. It is the duty of the Government which arrests them to do that. If they are innocent, it is a crying shame that they should languish in prison. One of them we know to be in close confinement; we know not where the other is; he was ordered through the lines, and it was said in the newspapers that the confederate authorities refused to receive him, and he was brought back again, and where he is now we do not know. He is the second civil officer in the government of Kentucky, and he ought to be there to attend to his official duties.

These gentlemen, when they were arrested, were both citizens. Though they had been in the Army, and had rendered distinguished service, they were both out of the military service and engaged in civil pursuits. One of them, as I before said, was Lieutenant Governor of the State, and the other had been but a few days before his arrest chosen one of the electors on the McClellan presidential ticket; but he was thrown into prison and not permitted to exercise the functions of the office to which an overwhelming majority of the people of Kentucky had elevated him.

Sir, I did not expect that any opposition would be made to this resolution in the Senate Chamber of the United States. I had supposed that here at least there was still left some lingering love for the constitutional and civil liberties of the citizen. I had supposed there was still some regard felt here for those who, during this rebellion, had periled their lives in the Union cause in a hundred battles. Everybody knows that for more than two years Wolford's name was synonymous with deeds of noble daring. He was in the front for all that time, and he has fought in more than a hundred battles and skirmishes. Jacobs, too, was in the field, and he bears to-day upon his person wounds received in the gallant charges that he made upon the confederates. That such men as these are arrested without warrant and without charge, so far as they or their friends know, and one sent we know not where and the other left to languish in close confinement, is, in my judgment, a crying sin and a shame. Let us pass this resolution and call the matter to the attention of the President; let him look into the action of his subordinates, and if he finds that true and good men have been wrongfully dealt with, let him set them at liberty, and punish the guilty official who deprived them of their liberty. If he finds that there is reason to suppose them to be guilty of any offense, let him hand them over to the legally-constituted tribunals to be tried, convicted, and punished. But, sir, as their friend, I fear not investigation; I court it; for I know that whenever Wolford and Jacobs are allowed to be tried by any just and honorable tribunal they will come out unsathed, and their reputation will be hereafter, as it has been heretofore, that of men of honor, of dignity, of courage, and of ability. They are really above suspicion with all honorable and patriotic men.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I take for granted, from the indications we have had, that this resolution will be called up and passed; and I concur in thinking that it is all-important that inquiries of this sort should be made, because in point of fact very great injustice has been done in the past, and is now being done. I believe, however, that in those cases the President has had no participation whatever. The misconduct, where there was misconduct, has been the act of his officers, his subalterns; and, as far as I am advised, in the general, whenever the matter has been brought before him, he has applied the proper remedy.

Congress passed, some two years ago, I think, an act which was intended to put an end, in a measure, to the principal injustice which was the result, and sure to be the result, of these military arrests; and in all cases, as provided for by that act, where the parties were not liable to military control, the persons charged were to be handed over to the civil tribunal, and if an indictment was not found within a limited period they were to be discharged. I speak knowingly when I say to the Senate that that law has been altogether disregarded in Maryland, and that it has equally been disregarded within this District. Men without number have been arrested, and have been handed over, not to the civil tribunals for trial, but to military commissions, and have been convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary, and are now, some of them, suffering under those sentences. These military gentlemen—I speak not of the President of the United States—seem to think that they are under no obligation at all to observe the civil laws; not only not bound to observe the laws of the States where they happen to be located at the time, but not bound to observe the laws of Congress; and they not only assume jurisdiction, but I know, if I know anything of law, that they have from time to time, and indeed constantly, convicted upon evidence that would not be received in any court of civil justice in the country.

But I rose more especially to state a case which will show the Senate the great extent to which this usurpation of authority has been extended. At the late election in Maryland, when the question before the people was whether the constitution framed by the convention who had that subject under their consideration should be adopted by the people or not, a gentleman of Caroline county, Union from the beginning of this civil strife and Union still, offered to vote, and took the oaths prescribed, every one of them, answered every question propounded to him, but was refused, and he sued the judge of election, as he had a perfect right to do. The military commander in Baltimore, by some persons immediately in the neighborhood where the fact occurred, being informed of it, the gentleman was arrested, having committed no offense at all unless (if that be an offense) suing the judge for refusing to receive his vote, brought to the city of Baltimore, thrown into prison, and I believe is there still. He was not only thrown into prison and kept in prison, but his friends were not permitted to see him, and have not been permitted, as I believe, since to see him.

That is one case. The last election in our State for members of our Legislature resulted in the choice of a majority of citizens who were called Democrats. There was a majority of two in the Senate of Maryland. One of them, elected from one of our counties, said to be a timid man, was threatened with arrest if he did not resign, and he resigned. But that left a majority still. In the county of Somerset, where a Democrat was elected, receiving a majority of between three and four thousand votes, he received a very polite letter from the general in command, asking him in substance whether he thought it was right that he should take his seat in the Senate of Maryland, as he had raised a rebel flag in April, 1861, upon his own premises. He replied to it—I have the reply by me—courteously, denying the charge, protesting that it was altogether false, asking permission to satisfy the major general that it was false, saying that he would come up at any moment in order to lay before him the proofs which he said he had to establish the fact of its falsehood; and the reply to the request was a file of soldiers and his arrest; and he was brought to the city of Baltimore, thrown into the most loathsome dungeon, which had formerly been used as a mere slave pen, without bed-clothing to lie upon, and the next day, without investigation and opportunity for defense, he was sent South by order of the major general.

Mr. POWELL. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask who that major general was?

Mr. JOHNSON. Major General Wallace. The President was informed of it, and at the time he was informed of it he was told that the order had not been executed. He immediately sent a dispatch requesting that nothing more should be done, and the answer to the dispatch was that the man had been sent South already! Now, whether he was guilty of raising the rebel flag in 1861 or not, I have no personal knowledge; nor have I any personal knowledge of the gentleman himself; but he is represented to me to be a man of the highest possible character, a man of unimpeached integrity, and whose word would be taken by everybody who knows him.

I have no doubt that General Wallace has acted under the impression that he was discharging a duty; representations have been made to him upon the faith of which he has acted; but in his desire to perform his duty, and to rid Maryland of those whom he supposed were traitors, he forgot that every citizen of Maryland has a right to be heard when he is charged with an offense.

It may be, Mr. President, that upon the ground of military necessity in the beginning of this dreadful war, aiming as it did at the very life of the nation, these arrests were unavoidable; but, thank God, it is not so now; thank God, it seems now to be approaching its end, and the end will be the restoration of the Union; but let the Senate of the United States, if upon reasons of military necessity they have heretofore refused to interfere, say now that in suppressing the rebellion they mean to preserve the rights of the loyal citizens. The case to which I have adverted is now under the examination, as I understand, of the President of the United States; and I have confidence in him as a lawyer and as a humane man, as one willing, to the extent of his knowledge, to maintain the rights of the citizen, and as a man anxious, as much as any other man living, to execute justice in mercy, that he will see that no possible harm shall fall upon a citizen of Maryland without cause.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask what power the President of the United States has to redress the wrong which he says has been committed against the rights of this citizen of Maryland?

Mr. JOHNSON. Take him out of prison—discharge him.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire if that is redress?

Mr. JOHNSON. Redress! It is not ample redress. It is the only redress in the power of the President. There is another mode of redress: to sue the wrong-doer—the only way to obtain full indemnity if he happens to be able to meet the proper indemnity. But if my honorable friend himself were thrown into a loathsome prison, and he were by himself or his friends to apply to the President of the United States to take him out, I suppose he would have no doubt that to a certain extent the taking of him out would put an end to the injury done him, would be a redress.

But, Mr. President, I was about to say with reference to the honorable member from Michigan, as well as to the one from Wisconsin, that information of that sort is necessary in order to satisfy the Senate whether it is not important, if the laws as they are now upon the statute-book are not sufficient to meet the exigency, to provide for it by further legislation. We cannot know what the mischiefs are in any other way as authoritatively as we may know it when the President shall send an answer to a resolution of this description. Suppose the President states a wholly unjustifiable cause for keeping these parties in prison, will it not be the duty of the Congress of the United States, the Senate being a component part of the legislative department, to pass a law to cover such cases in the future? And if the President—I mention it by way of supposition, hypothetically, with no idea that the President will ever be guilty of an offense of that description—if the President shall think proper to violate such a law, then the Constitution furnishes a mode by which the people of the United States can redress the wrong—impeachment, trial, conviction, and dismissal from office.

Mr. President, it is very strange that at this time of day, after we have been, up to the beginning of this rebellion, the freest people upon the face of God's earth, protected by every guarantee deemed at all material to secure individual liberty, we should be seriously disputing whether it is in the power of the Executive of the United States, or anybody professing to act under the authority of the United States, to seize a citizen, and incarcerate him, and punish him without trial. Why, sir, if such a doctrine was announced in the House of Commons, in England, or in the House of Lords, it would strike with dismay and astonishment the men who are entitled to the privileges and the rights of Magna Charta; and our rights are just as extensive, if not more extensive. Let us then say to the President, if it be necessary to say it to him, but above all, let us say it to those who are acting in subordinate capacities under him, "Your arms shall not be laid upon a single American citizen without cause, and he shall be at liberty, if you assign a cause, to prove its falsehood."

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall now take a vote on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the order of the day for the purpose of taking up the resolution which has been indicated.

The motion was agreed to—ayes thirty, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] which is the pending question, to insert after the word "Senate" the words "if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest;" so that the resolution will then read:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, all information in his possession bearing on the arrest and imprisonment of Colonel Richard T. Jacobs, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Kentucky, and Colonel Frank Wolford, one of the presidential electors of that State; particularly by whose order they were arrested and imprisoned, where they are at present confined, and what offenses are charged against them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1854, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the following appointments to supply vacancies in committees:

Mr. DIXON as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia; and Mr. HALE to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Judiciary.

MANUFACTURE OF BUNTING.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I rise to submit a motion, but before doing so I ask leave to read an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Navy:

"The chief of the Bureau of Navigation submits the usual reports of the Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac office, and the general administration of his department. Nearly all the nautical instruments used in the Navy, which, prior to the war, were procured abroad, are now of American manufacture, not excepting chronometers and comparing watches. The same gratifying advance cannot be stated with reference to material for flags, as we still sail under foreign bunting. Notwithstanding the large quantity used by the Army, the Navy, and the commercial marine, scarcely any progress has been had in inducing American establishments to undertake its manufacture."

My motion is that so much of the report of the Secretary of the Navy as relates to sailing under foreign bunting, and so much of the President's message and its accompanying reports as relate to the manufactures of the country, be referred to the Senate committee on that subject.

American nationality, it will be observed, is recognized and defended under a banner the materials of which are fashioned by the skill and labor of a people who are our only rivals, and whose Government, participating in the doubtful honor with one other, is believed to be our greatest and most dangerous enemy.

Be that belief well or insufficiently grounded, I concur with the views expressed by the Secretary, and I partake of his feeling of dissatisfaction in the failure to induce American citizens to produce materials for the manufacture of the flag of our country.

This sentiment cannot but animate the breast of every Senator. It must have a place in the heart of every American, whether born upon its soil or naturalized into its interests.

Should not the hope be coupled with a resolution that when the next annual report shall be presented to the country our flag will be wrought into its beautiful proportions upon American soil, by heads and hands which are true to the great principles it represents, true to the heroic dead, and to the brave heroes now banded under its folds, and true to the soil, every foot of which, God helping, will soon acknowledge its original sway?

It has become far dearer, far more sacred to loyal hearts, by the great deeds and greater sacrifices which have been offered up under it at the shrine of democratic liberty and republican government. Let it come to us free, free from even the atmospheric contact of a people not pledged to progress and a better civilization; a people not yet freed from decayed aristocracies or modern despotism. I disclaim all sentiment, yet I do not believe but that our victories will be more triumphant, our peace more permanent, if every fiber of our flag is handled in its construction by brave men and fair women, whose prayers will ascend to a just God to defend it; and while it rests in their hands it may gather some of the strength, resolution, and devotion of a great people, which when it must be laid the hour of strife may better inspire its defenders to braver deeds and stronger resolutions in support of the greatest of human struggles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of reference will be made if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 358) to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 622) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. THOMAS D. ELIOT of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM D. KELLEY of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WARREN P. NOBLE of Ohio, managers on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 380) for the relief of George W. Murray; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

FREEDOM TO SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution which was the special order of the day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States, the pending question being the motion of Mr. DAVIS to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I would like the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON,] or any Senator who is a lawyer, and who supports this measure, to inform us of the clause in the Constitution that invests Congress with the power to pass it. I will read two or three lines of the resolution:

Resolved, &c., That, for the purpose of encouraging enlistments and promoting the efficiency of the military and naval forces of the United States, it is hereby enacted that the wife and children, if any he have, of any person that has been, or may be, mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be forever free, any law, usage, or custom whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding, &c.

I want to know what provision of the Constitution confers on Congress the power to pass such a measure. If my friend from Minnesota will answer that question at the present time I will with pleasure give way that he may respond.

The Congress of the United States is not clothed with plenary legislative power. The whole Government is a Government of delegated powers, and Congress can pass no law whatever on any subject unless it has the power delegated to it by the Constitution. That position no gentleman who has any, the smallest, pretensions to legal reading will deny. Congress, though, has two classes of powers. The first are those which are delegated to it by express language. They are enumerated in the instrument, such as to lay and collect taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, establish a uniform rule of bankruptcy, raise and support armies, &c. Unless the words of the Constitution express or import a power to pass a law, Congress has no power whatever to pass it, except under another clause of the Constitution, which I will read:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

This clause of the Constitution establishes a large and undefined class of legislative powers, which by Chief Justice Marshall and other judges of the Supreme Court and jurists generally are termed the incidental powers of Congress. Now, sir, I deny that there is any express enumerated power given by the Constitution to Congress which authorizes it to pass this measure, and no Senator can produce a clause of the Constitution that confers the power in terms, or by language which imports such a power.

We are driven, then, to this conclusion: that if Congress have the power to pass this resolution it is under the clause which vests Congress with the incidental powers to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry those which are expressly enumerated into execution. Does that clause vest Congress with the power to pass this measure? I maintain that it does not; and why? Because the exercise of that power in this particular case would be in direct conflict with express provisions of the Constitution which guaranty the rights of property to the citizen.

The fifth amendment of the Constitution, which has been quoted countless times within the last two or three years in this body, I will advert to again, and will read:

"Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Now, sir, I state this principle, that where there is a right secured to the citizen by the express language of the Constitution, that right cannot be destroyed or impaired by any implication or by any incidental power which Congress may claim or attempt to exercise. I lay down that proposition in accordance with the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland. I will read a short paragraph from that opinion:

"We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in a manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

I concede this principle, that where there is an express power to be executed by Congress, any incidental power appropriate to the execution of that express primary power which is not prohibited by or which is not in conflict with the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, may be adopted as an auxiliary power; but, on the other hand, I maintain as a principle of constitutional law not to be shaken, that where the incidental power claimed is in direct conflict with an express provision of the Constitution, with a right of the citizen expressly guaranteed by it, according to the principle laid down by Chief Justice Marshall, such incidental power is unauthorized by the Constitution, and Congress has no power to adopt it. This principle clearly forbids the passage of the pending resolution. It proposes to set free the wife and children of all negro soldiers who have heretofore, or who may hereafter, enlist into the armies of the United States; to take such property from their owners, not to be put into the service, not to be applied to any public use; although the Government has no power to take private property except for public use, with a positive prohibition to take it for the public service without just compensation to the owner.

I concede that Congress has the express power to raise armies; as an incidental power, can offer bounties in the form of money and land to persons that will enlist in the military service. Why has Congress the power to resort to this incidental means of promoting enlistments in aid of the execution of that great and primary power of raising armies? Because there is nothing in the express provisions or the spirit of the Constitution, there is no right expressly guaranteed by it to the citizen, that comes into conflict with the exercise of the incidental power of offering such bounties. But the pending is altogether a different measure. There are express clauses of the Constitution which guaranty to every citizen his rights of property, one of which clauses declares that he shall not forfeit life, liberty, or property except by due process of law, and another, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, that would be directly and to the extent of a large amount of property infringed by it.

Mr. President, the only seeming color of authority on the part of Congress to pass this measure is to promote enlistments in the Army. It presents some analogy to the power of Congress to offer bounties for that purpose. It may be considered as in the nature of a bounty. But the exercise of a power by Congress to offer a bounty in any form is not an express power of Congress, but it is one of its incidental powers, and cannot be exercised or executed in any form so as to abrogate or impair the right of any kind of property.

Now, sir, I might, if I chose, offer an amendment to this joint resolution in something like these terms:

And whereas the State of Massachusetts has had much travail in her efforts to raise her quota of troops to put down the wicked rebellion, and in her great stress she sent agents into many States, both rebel and loyal, to enlist negroes; and into foreign countries to contract with the subjects of alien Governments to become substitutes for her own citizens in the armies of the United States; and whereas some of her sons in high places had a strong disposition, though not quite enough of stomach to do battle in this holy war, whereby much of humiliation, sorrow, and remorse came upon the old Bay State: Now, for remedy thereof, and to encourage enlistments in that State, and to cause the highways and the alleys to swarm with her patriotic sons marching on to put down this accursed rebellion,

Be it further enacted, That any and all persons of the proper military age, who will enlist into and as part of the Massachusetts troops, to serve in the United States Army for the term of three years or during the war, shall after such enlistment, and on so electing and declaring, become a full and equal partner, associate, or incorporator with any individual or individuals, partners, company, corporations, or other associates whatever in said State, whose pursuit and business is or may be banking, brokering, merchandising, shipping, trading, fishing, manufacturing, house-building, ship building, of whole or component parts, or making or fabricating anything whatever, whether by hand or by machinery, or by whatever power, agency, or means; such enlistment entitling every person to elect and determine for himself with what individual or individuals, firms, partnerships, corporations, or other associations, in any form whatever he may attach himself; and thereupon to become as fully interested in all property and estate, real or personal, money, debts, stock, machinery, and every interest and right connected with such business as though he were an original partner, corporator, or associate.

I ask you, sir, if an amendment like that were offered to this joint resolution, would it not have as much and more effect to encourage enlistments in Massachusetts than this joint resolution will have anywhere? Can any man doubt that the prediction of the Governor of Massachusetts, that if a certain measure was adopted by the President of the United States the highways and the alleys would swarm with her patriotic soldiers rushing to the Army, would be realized, and more than realized, if an amendment like this should be adopted as a part of this joint resolution? A proposition authorizing any man who enlisted into the service in Massachusetts, upon the fact of so enlisting to be thereby and thereupon entitled to associate himself as a partner with any individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association whatever, and to become equally and fully interested in all the estate, property, and means of that individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association, would be a measure eminently calculated to encourage enlistments. Pass such a measure as that, and its efficiency in calling troops into the military service of the United States would be manifold more operative and successful than the measure under consideration. So far as you waive objections to its constitutionality and its justice, so far as you consider it as a practical measure only, to encourage enlistments, no man can doubt its eminent efficiency.

Sir, why should not this be adopted as an amendment to the pending measure? It also would be a war measure—a measure calculated to fill up the ranks of our Army, to increase its numbers and efficiency, and to bring the rebellion to a more speedy close. In all of its practical operations and results it would be signally an effective war measure. What objection can be made to it? No possible objection except those which I make to the present measure.

I concede that Congress has not the power to pass such a measure as is expressed in this supposed amendment, because of the objections that I have urged to the measure itself. It would be in conflict with the rights of property of the people of Massachusetts guaranteed to them by the Constitution, and it would be flagitiously unjust; but in neither respect would it be more flagitiously unjust.

Indeed, any objection that may be made to the proposition which I have just read can be made with more truth and force in principle to the measure under consideration. The great and principal effect of this resolution would be in Kentucky, and upon her people I presume it is intended. In 1860 we had two hundred and twenty-five thousand four hundred and eighty-three slaves in that State. In my own county we had six thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven. I have no doubt from the number of enlistments that have been made from the slaves of Kentucky that three fourths of that population fit for military service are now in the Army or some employment of the United States. That such is the proportion in my own county I do not entertain a doubt. The military portion of that population in the county of Bourbon was something the rise of six hundred before any of them were recruited. By actual enumeration about six hundred of her slaves have already attached themselves to the Army. They were recruited without any regard to order, form, or principle. The whole object seemed to be to demoralize the institution, and to get every slave man who could be seduced to join the service by any mode of operation whatever, to do so. They sent their recruiting agents, foreigners principally, mostly Dutchmen, all over the county, and pretty well over the State. They received and enrolled every slave negro who could be inveigled to give his consent. Some that were over age and some that were not proper military material because of disease, and females disguised in male clothes, were admitted. At least three fourths of the slaves suited for military service in that county have already attached themselves to the Army. They have enlisted, and they now belong to the armies of the United States, as much so as if their wives and their children were declared to be free.

Pass this measure, and its application would not be to one fourth of the male slave population of Bourbon, or, I believe, of the State of Kentucky to be enlisted, but would be mainly upon those that are now in the military service by freeing their wives and children.

What, then, is the object of the measure? It is not much to encourage enlistments. We have already sent more than our proportion of negroes to the field. We have but a small remnant yet remaining. The measure does not propose to be limited to those who have not enlisted and who may yet be enlisted, but it proposes to comprehend those who have enlisted as well as those who may hereafter enlist. The object is to deprive slave owners of their property; it is still further to demoralize the institution; it is to break it up per fas aut nefas; it is utterly to disregard the Constitution and the laws which secure equally with every other this description of property to their owners, and trample them under foot, lawlessly, unjustly, without answering any wise policy of the Government, and utterly to destroy slave property.

Is the Senate going to lend itself to the passage of such a measure? Before doing so, ought it not to ask seriously and gravely whence is its power to pass so extraordinary a measure?

Sir, the precedents of to-day become the law of to-morrow. The precedents that are set and established by one party are transferred to its successor, and by its successor they are taken up and enforced as law against those who have made them. Are the members of the Senate ready to have this poisoned chalice which they are now concocting and mixing for other lips tendered to their own? Sir, there is a retributive justice even in human affairs. The wrongs and iniquities which one party in power perpetrate upon another out of power sooner or later return to plague themselves. That law of retribution is tardy, but it is certain; it comes sooner or later. Would to God it could come with more promptitude and with full measure in every case.

Sir, I do not contend for this great principle, the inviolability of private property and the guarantee which the Constitution makes to its owner, for myself or the people of my own State alone, nor for this generation alone. It is a great and enduring principle of right and of just and enlightened government. It is one of the principal ends for which government is formed, and no Government that essentially and continuously violates it could ever receive the permanent support of a free, enlightened, and virtuous people.

What does this joint resolution propose to do? Utterly to disregard this great fundamental principle of the Constitution, this guarantee of the right of property to the citizen. Sir, property may be taken from the citizen by the Government in two modes. It may be taken in the form of taxation or in the exercise of the power of eminent domain. In the first place, wise legislation aims at equality, and makes the law imposing the tax bear upon the people as generally, as equitably, and as impartially as possible. But whenever property is taken from a citizen by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, that citizen is asked to contribute to the public service something more than the rest of the citizens are required to render; and there is not a decision in any of the courts of the United States, or in any of the States, upon this point, in relation to taking property from the citizen in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, but what expressly lays down the principle that it is his right to receive a full and fair compensation for his property thus taken. Nearly every State in the Union has decided and maintained that principle; yea, more, they have gone on and decided, further to fortify that sacred right of property, that the citizen cannot be deprived of the possession of his property without payment of its full and fair price, or without that price is then secured to him. This loose practice of the Government from its foundation, to take property upon its own valuation, or even upon the valuation of a court or commissioners, and to make no arrangement, no provision, by law or otherwise, to secure to the owner the value of the property, is an unauthorized and an unconstitutional exercise of power.

Sir, this position will not be controverted by any man who has legal learning at all respectable: that this provision of the Constitution secures not only the right of property, but the possession of the property to the citizen, and that the right of the citizen to this property is not divested, and cannot be divested, unless he receives full compensation for it, or unless that full compensation is secured to him before the property is taken. Whenever there are courts in this country sufficiently enlightened, impartial, and firm, to administer the constitutional principle, they will decide that it is the duty of Congress to pass laws, having general application to every case where private property is or may be taken for public use, to pay, or to secure to the owner of that property before he is forced to part with the possession, its full and fair value. If I had time I could adduce a dozen cases from courts, running from Massachusetts to California, establishing that principle, and establishing in addition that unless these conditions be complied with, the chancellor will issue his injunction to hold the owner of the property in his possession and to prevent it being taken from him. Is not that the law of the Constitution? Is it not the law of reason and justice? What objection can there be made to it?

Why, sir, has Congress the power to pass any law that in its judgment would promote the efficiency of the Army and help to bring this war to a speedy and successful close? Why then does not Congress pass a law to seize all the money in the banks of the United States? Why does it not pass a law authorizing its military officers to go abroad through the land to gather up according to their discretion and power all the necessary supplies for the Army? Why does it not pass a law authorizing the President, by his will and by his dictum, to conscript any or all the military population of the United States?

Mr. President, the views that I have here offered, I think, establish conclusively the propriety of the Senate referring this joint resolution and the proposition that I have read in connection with it as instructions to the Committee on the Judiciary, that we may have the benefit of a report of that committee in relation to the question of the constitutionality and validity of this measure if Congress should pass it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and on motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SUMNER, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. BUCKALEW.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated that Mr. PRUYN, having been placed upon the Committee of Ways and Means, asked to be excused from further service on the Committee of Claims.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER then appointed Mr. TOWNSEND to fill the vacancy on the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER also announced the following as the select committee on pensioners:

MESSRS. GRISWOLD, WHALEY, PERHAM, WASHBURN of Massachusetts, MILLER of Pennsylvania, HUBBARD of Connecticut, and ROSS.

PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Whereas, the Government of the United States has treated rebel prisoners of war with the utmost care, retaining them in suitable and healthy places of confinement, supplying them with ample rations of the best and most nutritious quality, attending them with skillful medical treatment and care in cases of sickness and wounds, and affording them every proper facility for improving their condition and alleviating their imprisonment; and whereas the rebel authorities have confined Union prisoners in unhealthy and loathsome prisons, and in pestilential camps without shelter; have furnished rations scanty and unwholesome; have neglected to furnish suitable medical attendance; have withheld from them clothing, provisions, and money sent to them from their friends at home, so that thousands have died from starvation, and contagious and other diseases caused by such barbarous neglect and maltreatment; and this notwithstanding the continuous and earnest efforts of the Government of the United States to procure an alleviation of their sufferings while in imprisonment, or a just and equitable exchange: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, if such treatment of Union prisoners is persisted in, for confining rebel prisoners in our hands in such prisons, and allowing them such kind and quality of rations, as may be adopted by the rebel government, to the end that the rebel authorities may be thereby compelled to treat the Union prisoners in their hands according to the rules and usages of civilized warfare.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to object to the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, but he will remember there is now pending a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for all correspondence in reference to the exchange of prisoners. It was offered by myself the other day, and was laid over. I should like to see that correspondence before voting, although I believe the resolution of the gentleman to be eminently correct.

I was loth to believe, sir, that such barbarities were practiced by the rebels upon our prisoners, but I do know that the asseverations of the gentleman in that resolution are true, and that some action is demanded in the name of humanity on behalf of our prisoners. I should prefer to see a wholesale exchange of them. We tried again and again in this House—

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I do not yield for the purpose of debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio object to the resolution?

Mr. COX. I do not.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the internal revenue law, that instruments required by the one hundred and fifty-first section of said law to be stamped, but which have not, through inadvertence or other cause, been stamped at the time of making or issuing the same, may, upon the payment of a proper penalty, be subsequently stamped and thereby rendered legal and valid; and that they leave to report by bill or otherwise.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of setting apart a portion of the public lands for the benefit of such soldiers of the United States as have been, or shall be, permanently disabled during the present war, and whose circumstances may require the generous aid of their country, by granting to the several States such lands, the proceeds of which shall be applied to the exclusive benefit of said soldiers, either in founding homes for them in their respective States, or otherwise, as the several State Legislatures may determine, and shall report by bill or otherwise.

VICE ADMIRAL.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs House bill No. 606, to create the grade of vice admiral in the Navy.

Mr. COX. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

J. C. CARTER.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I ask leave to offer a joint resolution for reference.

Objection was made.

Cries of "Regular order!"

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I want to let the parties go home. There will be no objection to it, I am sure.

Objection being withdrawn,

Mr. SCOTFIELD introduced a joint resolution relative to J. C. Carter, captain in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SPALDING. I now demand the regular order of business.

BUREAU OF FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the Senate amendments to House bill No. 51, to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, which was postponed from the last session to this day.

Mr. ELIOT. This bill was returned from the Senate with a great variety of amendments. I am instructed to move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would like to hear the amendments read.

Mr. ELIOT. I believe they were read before the adjournment at the last session.

The SPEAKER. The impression of the Chair is that they have not been read—that the reading was suspended at that time.

Mr. COX. How does this bill come before the House?

The SPEAKER. It was passed by the House, came back from the Senate with various amendments, and was postponed until to-day.

Mr. PENDLETON. Have the amendments been printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed.

Mr. SPALDING. I would suggest the propriety of having them printed.

Mr. ELIOT. The amendments have all been printed, and are in the form of a new bill attached to House bill No. 51.

The amendments were to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That an office, to continue during the existing war, is hereby created in the Treasury Department, to be called the Bureau of Freedmen, meaning thereby such persons as have once been slaves, under the care of a Commissioner, with an annual salary of $4,000, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and there shall be a chief clerk, acting also as disbursing officer, under bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of his duties, with an annual salary of $2,000, and also such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary, all of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to create departments of freedmen within the rebel States, not to exceed two in each State, so far as the same may be brought under the military power of the United States; and each department shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,000, under bond as required by the chief clerk, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, not, however, to exceed four in each district, at a compensation not exceeding $1,500.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the military commander within any department shall, on the application of the assistant commissioner thereof, supply all useful military support in the discharge of the duties of such assistant commissioner, unless there are controlling military reasons for withholding the same; and any military commander may be appointed assistant commissioner, without increase of salary.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several departments, and it shall be his duty especially to watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen, and generally, by careful regulations, to protect these persons in the enjoyment of their rights, to promote their welfare, and to secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in every respect as a freedman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, within their respective departments, to take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which the United States have possession, and not already appropriated to Government uses; and also to take possession of all personal property found on and belonging to such estate, and to rent or lease all such real estate, or any part thereof, with the personal property aforesaid, and to act as inspectors of the same; or in case no proper lessees can be found, then to permit the same to be cultivated or occupied by the freedmen, on such terms, in either case, and under such regulations, as the commissioner and such freedmen may agree: Provided, That no freedmen shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent, nor shall any such contract be for a longer period than twelve months; but nothing in this section contained shall be construed to prevent the due execution of process against the real estate and personal property before mentioned, issued in due course of law from courts of competent jurisdiction: And provided further, That no lease and no permit to be given under the provisions of this act shall continue for a longer time than one year without renewal, nor shall any such lease or permit bind the United States to pay damages for any military dispossession or because of title paramount to that of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall be ready, as advisory guardians, to aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or, where they have rented plantations or small holdings, in the application of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others; that they shall further do what they can as arbitrators, to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved, whether among themselves or between themselves and other persons; and in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friends of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order 331, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act; but such lease shall not continue beyond the period of one year from its date; and immediately upon the organization of any department of freedmen, such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such department, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents. But all expenses necessarily incurred by such agents in any department, prior to its organization under this act, shall be defrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in his hands arising from the leases made by such agents.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds arising from leases in the several departments to pay the salaries and other expenses under this act, so that the bureau herein established may become at an early day self-supporting; and any proceeds over and above the annual expense thereof shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all officers, civil and military, charged with the execution of any law, proclamation, or military order of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen, not mustered into, nor regularly engaged in, the military service, to make return to the Commissioner of all their proceedings in execution thereof, under such regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall communicate the same to Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as the supervising special agents, appointed within the States within which the insurrection exists and the authority of the civil tribunals is overthrown, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony; for any act of embezzlement, or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value for any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity; or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act; or in carrying on any business or being in any manner, directly or indirectly, interested in any business carried on under the superintendence of the officers appointed under this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That whenever the said Commissioner cannot find abandoned real estate on which to employ all of the freedmen who may come under his care and control by virtue of this act, it shall be his duty, so far as may be practicable, to provide for them homes and employment, with humane and suitable persons, at fair and just compensation for their services.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1863, be, and the same hereby is, repealed.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not think that it is worth while at this time to occupy the attention of the House by calling it to the various differences between the bill adopted by the Senate and that reported to them from the House. My object now in rising is to ask the House to non-concur in the action of the Senate for the purpose of asking that a committee of conference be appointed.

I have no doubt it will be found, upon conference, that it will be practicable from the two bills to frame one which will be more satisfactory to the House than either of the bills now before the House. I move a non-concurrence in the Senate amendments, and unless some gentleman desires to speak, I will call the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the House has some right to time for a consideration of these amendments before they go before a committee of conference. This is the first time I have been able to obtain a copy of the bill, though it may have been printed before, and I suggest a postponement to a certain day, or the making it the special order for some given day.

The result of these committees of conference, as the gentleman well knows, is to take away all substantial action from this and the other body, and to intrust the main legislation to a committee selected by the Speaker and a committee appointed by the Senate, and then, under the pressure of the previous question, we are obliged to accede to or reject some bill which the committee has agreed to, but which the House may not have agreed to. I suggest that the gentleman give us an opportunity, by a postponement to some given day, to consider the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I will say that the bill which has just been read has been in fact printed since last June. When the bill was sent back from the Senate it was ordered, upon my motion, to be printed, and it has been within the reach of members of the House from that time to the present. It was very desirable that there should have been action upon this bill before the close of last session, but it had been delayed in the committee of the Senate from the early part of March until the early part of June, and it did not come back to the House until it was too late to act upon it last session. Upon a motion made on this side, the bill was postponed until to-day.

Now, on the 3d of July, I think, a bill passed both Houses, under which certain proceedings are now being had which make it very desirable that the action of the House upon this bill in reference to a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs should be speedy. I cannot agree to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, to postpone this bill in its present form. It will necessarily have to be the subject of action before a conference committee, and I am quite satisfied that the interest of the public and of that class of people who are now suffering very much for want of public care, will be better promoted by action now, so far as to send the bill to a committee of conference.

Mr. KASSON. Upon the first reading of the amendment, it struck me that the first section of the Senate bill made no discrimination between the custody of those freedmen who are made free by State action and those made free by United States action. I simply call his attention to it in order that in the conference committee that point may be considered, which may be essential to the coöperation of at least some portion of the House in the general object. I would be glad to be corrected, if I am in error touching that provision of the Senate bill, by the gentleman, who has given it more attention than I have.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Iowa is perfectly correct in this, that the bill does not purport to affect any freedmen other than those who belong to States which are in rebellion. It does not affect, as it stands now, the freedmen of Maryland, or of Kentucky, or of Missouri.

Mr. KELLEY. Unless such a one should stray within the territorial limits of the rebellion. Those limits bound the jurisdiction of the bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the amendment of the Senate on the table.

Mr. ELIOT. Would that carry the bill with it?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 71, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Biles, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Kernan, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, John B. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Townsend, Webster, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Yeaman—51.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brodhead, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hopper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McInnis, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norfon, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perlman, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilson, and Windom—71.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Baxter, Blaine, Brandegee, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Fenton, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kulbickisch, King, Knapp, Loan, Mallory, McBride, McKinney, Middleton, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Odell, Perry, Pike, Radford, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, William G. Steele, Stiles, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—60.

So the House refused to lay the amendment of the Senate on the table.

During the roll-call,

Messrs. HARRINGTON, COFFROTH, BAXTER, COBB, and VOORHEES, who were not within the bar when their names were called, severally asked leave to vote.

Mr. DAWES objected.

Mr. ORTH stated that Mr. JULIAN was detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon ordering the main question to be now put.

The main question was ordered; and being put, the House voted to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and ask a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was non-concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House providing for an adjournment of the House from the 22d instant until the 5th of January next, with an amendment including the Senate in said adjournment over, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed bill of the House No. 394, for the relief of Mary Scales Accardi, and House bill No. 399, for the relief of Emily A. Lyon, severally with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the House No. 478, for the relief of Charles M. Pott, and bill of the House No. 603, to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from the public stores.

The message further announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed the bill of the House (No. 452) to grant a pension of eight dollars per month to Harris Welch.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 62) to remove all disqualifications of color in carrying the mails; and

A bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. STEVENS called up, as a privileged question, the message from the Senate in reference to the adjournment, which was to amend the concurrent resolution so as to make it read as follows: That when the two Houses adjourn on Thursday, the 22d instant, they adjourn to meet on Thursday, January 5, 1865.

Mr. STEVENS. The only change in the resolution is that it now allows the Senate to adjourn as well as the House. The House had thought at the time it passed the resolution, that so grave a body as the Senate might not desire to have a holiday, and therefore the resolution only provided for the House. The Senate, however, took it into its head to amend the resolution by making it apply to both Houses, and I do not know why we should not assent to that.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, also reported a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1865, and asked that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMAN. To avoid the necessity of having the bill read through at the present time, I rise to inquire whether this bill contains any appropriations not authorized by existing law.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe not, sir. The Committee of Ways and Means has left out one or two matters which were thought to be doubtful.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest that it shall be the understanding that objection may be taken in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as well as if the bill were in the House under the rules.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to have a deficiency bill put through to-morrow. It is impossible to look over and compare the estimates. Indeed, we have not yet received copies of the Secretary of the Treasury's report and accompanying documents. They are not yet printed. It is impossible to act on an appropriation bill intelligently in this kind of way. If I am well informed, there are many deficiencies in this bill which are not provided for by law. I do not wish to cause any delay in the passage of the bill, but without having the report of the Secretary of the Treasury before us, and with no opportunity save the few hours one may have this evening to compare the estimates with the bill, it is quite impossible to act to-morrow with any deliberation on so important a matter as the deficiency bill.

Mr. STEVENS. We have agreed to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois to allow objections to be made in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There are some items in the bill which it is almost absolutely necessary to have provided for before the adjournment, and hence we have left out items which we supposed might be contested. I ask that the bill may be considered to-morrow. There is not a great deal in it.

Mr. BROOKS. All that I want is that there shall be due deliberation, and due time for the House to act on it.

Mr. STEVENS. If, when it is printed and taken up to-morrow there should be found any difficulty in it, the gentleman from New York can suggest what further course he desires.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is with the understanding that all questions of order are reserved.

The SPEAKER. That is understood.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, also reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th June, 1866, and asked that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, printed, and made the special order for the 9th day of January next.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust it will be understood that this bill comes in on exactly the same terms as the other bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for the 9th of January next.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to amend the act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railway Company of the District of Columbia, approved July 1, 1864, which was read a first and second time. It so amends the seventeenth section of the act of incorporation as to extend the time for the completion of the railroad line, except that part thereof between Seventeenth street and the Capitol, for one year, provided that the line between Seventeenth street and the Capitol be completed, equipped, and running within ten days. The second section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with it.

Mr. CHANLER. Is there anything in the bill in reference to the cars running on Sunday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is not.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to suggest the propriety of striking out the second section. That section is wholly unnecessary, and if enacted it may go further than we intend. If any prior act is inconsistent with this, this necessarily repeals that.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the second section will be stricken out.

There was no objection.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BEAMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that call for a moment, that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. BEAMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

TAXATION OF COASTING VESSELS.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending Section one hundred and three of the internal revenue act, so that coasting vessels which shall pay an annual tonnage tax shall be exempt from the tax of two and a half per cent. upon freight, &c., and thus placed upon the same footing as provincial vessels bringing cargoes to our ports.

SALARIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BEAMAN again called for the regular order of business, but withdrew the call at the request of Mr. SLOAN, who asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of equalizing the salaries of the first or sole assistants in the respective Executive Departments whose duty it is to act as the head of the Departments in the absence, sickness, or other disability of the chief of such Departments, by fixing said salaries at the sum paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, or such other sum as said committee may think proper.

Objection being made, the resolution was not received.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the regular order of business; and the Speaker proceeded, as the regular order, to call the committees for reports.

GOVERNMENT OF REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. ASHLEY. I am directed by the select committee on the rebellious States to report back, with certain amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 602) to guaranty to certain States, whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government; and I ask that it be now put upon its passage.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. While the reading was in progress,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair is obliged to ask whether this bill, which is a printed bill with written interlineations, is the same bill that was reported on the 15th day of December. As to the interlineations it is a different bill from that reported on the day mentioned.

Mr. ASHLEY. The interlineations are the amendments proposed by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will first be read as printed, and afterwards the amendments proposed by the committee will be read.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] that, instead of having the bill read, it be postponed until the 10th day of January. I do not think that we can satisfactorily act on it to-day. Let the bill be printed, with the amendments proposed by the committee. I think that the bill is too important to be disposed of to-day. Some gentlemen around me suggest that the bill be postponed till the 5th of January. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the 5th of January will not be fixed. That is too early a day.

Mr. WILSON. If there is objection, I will adhere to my first suggestion, that it be postponed until the 10th. That will be Tuesday.

Mr. ASHLEY. If it be the opinion of gentlemen on this side of the House that the bill had better be postponed, I prefer that it should be postponed until Friday, the 6th of January.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that, if it will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. ASHLEY. If that is the understanding on this side of the House, and is satisfactory to gentlemen on the other, let it be postponed until Friday, the 6th, and be made a special order.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is too early a day.

Mr. COX. I object to so early a day, and I will state the reason of my objection. Reports are expected from other committees on subjects cognate to this—among others, the report of the Committee of Elections on the Louisiana case. I would like to have all these reports and bills before the House, and then all these questions might be considered very well together. Therefore, I think the gentleman had better name some time about the 1st of February, or certainly not earlier than the middle of January.

Mr. ASHLEY. Then I move that the bill be postponed until the 10th of January, and be the special order for that day after the morning hour and until disposed of.

The motion of Mr. ASHLEY was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to offer to this bill an amendment emancipating the wives and children of all persons who shall enlist in the armies of the United States, or who may now be in the armies of the United States, whether in the rebellious States or any other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can give notice of that amendment. At the present time the bill has passed from the consideration of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I give notice that I will offer such an amendment.

LEAVE TO VOTE.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I was detained from the House yesterday on account of illness; and I now ask unanimous consent for leave to record my vote on the several propositions on which the yeas and nays were called during my absence.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MAIL CARRIER SYSTEM.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so far modifying the post office laws in relation to the carrier system as to confine free delivery of mail matter to those places only which give promise of its being self-sustaining at an early day.

Mr. BOYD. I ask leave to present a private bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Have we concluded the call of committees for reports?

The SPEAKER. The call has not yet been completed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I object, and insist on the call of committees for reports.

FOREIGN MAILS.

Mr. ALLEY. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask that the bill be put on its passage, and call for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his demand for the previous question until we have had some explanation of the object and extent of the bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. Speaker, I will say, in explanation of the bill, that at the last session of Congress we adopted a measure for the transportation of the mails to the Pacific coast overland and by sea, in which is a provision to the effect that all mail matter sent from the western boundary of Kansas, or from the eastern boundary of California, shall not be carried, except at the price of letter postage, except one newspaper to bona fide subscribers from a place of publication. Under the ruling of the Postmaster General, that newspapers only, and a single one at that to subscribers, should be transmitted through the mails to those points from any of the offices, excluding periodicals, magazines, and exchanges, great complaint has arisen on the part of persons living in the Territories. It has been found that its practical operation has been to do great injustice to the people who are residents of the Territories, and it is to provide against that injustice that the pending bill has been proposed. I presume there can be no objection, as the committee have agreed to the bill unanimously.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. STEVENS. At the last session of Congress we adopted a proposition for the continuance of the overland mail for one year. I want to know whether, after we passed that bill, a contract was given to Mr. Holladay for one year or for the whole time. I want to know whether this has reference to that matter. If it does, I shall ask time to consider it.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say that the pending proposition has no reference whatever to the bill to which the gentleman refers. I have no official information on the subject. I have not had any correspondence or conversation with the Postmaster General in relation to that matter, but I have reason to believe, from conversation with other parties who claimed to know, that the contract was given to Mr. Holladay for the full term at $750,000 per annum.

Mr. STEVENS. And not given in accordance with our vote for one year?

Mr. ALLEY. So I am informed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the pending bill in any way affirm or recognize that contract?

Mr. ALLEY. This bill has nothing whatever to do with it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House joint resolution No. 126, declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college, and moved that it be ordered to be printed and recommitted to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed Senate bill No. 358, to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy; and in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

STENOGRAPHER FOR DISTRICT SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the petition of Joseph H. Bradley and thirty-six others, members of the bar, for appointment of a short-hand reporter for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. McBRIDE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington, and asked that it be put on its passage.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill contains an appropriation, and must, under the rules, go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. If the gentleman has a written report I have no objection to its being read.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask the Clerk to read the letter I send to his desk.

The letter was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me we ought to have some time for the examination of this claim, and I must hence insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. As this is an appropriation bill it must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask that a certain time be fixed for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent; and there is already a page and a half of bills on the Calendar which precede it.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask unanimous consent that it may be set down for consideration on Friday, the 6th day of January, in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

PAY OF COLORED SOLDIERS, ETC.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1864; which was read a first and second time.

The bill so amends the act referred to as to provide that all persons of color who have been enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States shall from the time of their enlistment be entitled to receive the pay, bounty, and clothing allowed to such persons by the laws existing at the time of their enlistment; and also authorizes the Attorney General to determine any question of law arising under this provision, and if the Attorney General shall determine that such enlisted persons are credited with or entitled to any pay, bounty, or clothing in addition to what they have already received, the Secretary of War shall make all necessary regulations, in connection with the pay department, to make pay in accordance with such determination.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the gentleman explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. It can be done only by unanimous consent, after the previous question is ordered.

No objection was made.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will turn to page 129 of the Statutes of last session, he will find in section four of the statute referred to, a provision which was intended to cover cases of negro regiments raised in the North that had been promised full soldiers' pay when they went into the service. In order to cover those cases, the section provided that all persons of color who were free on the 19th of April, 1861, and had enlisted subsequently, should be paid according as the Attorney General should interpret the law in existence at the time of their enlistment. It is found that the section met the wants of those colored regiments raised in Massachusetts and Ohio; but there are some colored soldiers who did not become free until a date subsequent to the 19th of April, but were enlisted on precisely the same terms and pledges as those who have received full pay. A petition which is now in my hands, and which has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, drawn by Colonel Higginson, states that his regiment and two or three others come under this description, and cannot obtain relief under the provisions of this bill by the clause restricting its action to those who were "free on the 19th of April." I have therefore recast the section, leaving out the words "who were free on the 19th of April." That cures the evil complained of, and does not otherwise change the law.

Mr. COX. As I understand it, it puts the negro soldiers on an equality.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to negro equality where it is confined to the negro race.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VICE ADMIRAL IN THE NAVY.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with an amendment a bill (H. R. No. 606) to create the grade of vice admiral in the Navy.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I would state that the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, is in precisely the same terms as the bill which passed the Senate this morning, and which is now on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent to take up that bill and pass upon it in lieu of the bill I have reported.

No objection being made, the bill of the Senate (No. 358) to establish the grade of vice admiral in the Navy of the United States was taken from the Speaker's table for consideration, and read a first and second time.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I presume that there can be no objection whatever to the passage of this bill. I have no disposition to discuss it, and call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts explain what that exception in the last section is. The last section states that some section of an act shall not apply to the vice admiral. What is that?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It simply provides that the incumbent of the office of vice admiral shall not be subject to be retired.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill on the same subject reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs was then laid on the table.

RANK OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished conduct, &c., which was read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill provides that any officer of the Navy or Marine corps, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be advanced not exceeding fifty numbers in rank for having exhibited eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle, or extraordinary heroism.

The second section provides that any officer of the Navy or Marine corps who shall be nominated to higher grade under the provisions of the first section of this act, or that of section nine of an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862, shall be promoted, notwithstanding the number of said grade may be full, but no further promotion shall take place in that grade except for like cause until the number is reduced to that provided by law.

The third section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if this bill includes volunteers in the Navy?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall move to amend it so as to give the volunteers a chance. Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. This bill is in accordance with the provisions of the existing law, with the exception that it changes the number from thirty to fifty; the present law requires that the person to be promoted shall be advanced thirty numbers in his own grade. It will be apparent, of course, that if the officer to be promoted is within thirty numbers of the head of his grade, he cannot be promoted the whole number to which he would be entitled, and this provision is that he may be advanced in rank instead of grade; that is, if advancing him thirty numbers will carry him into the grade next above his, it may so carry him. That is the only difference from the present law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All I desire is that the volunteers shall be placed on an equal footing and have a fair chance. I will frame an amendment which I think will meet the approbation of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COX. I suggest to the gentleman that he postpone the consideration of this bill until it can be printed and examined.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I would state, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, that the particular object in passing this bill at the present time is to allow the President to promote Captain Winslow, to whom Congress has already passed a vote of thanks for his gallant conduct in destroying the rebel pirate Alabama. Captain Winslow holds the rank of captain. The next grade above that is commodore. The grade of commodore is already full. He cannot, therefore, be promoted under the present law until after this bill has passed, which permits him to be made a commodore notwithstanding the limit of the number by the existing law.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to make any objection to any proper reward of Captain Winslow, or of Admiral Farragut, or anybody else, but it seems to me a wrong principle of legislation to create offices in order properly to recompense our soldiers or the officers of our Navy. We have created the office, this morning, of vice admiral without proper consideration, simply because it was recommended by the President and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. I did not like to oppose it, not because I did not think the policy wrong, but because it might seem to be an attack upon the gallant naval officer who is to be rewarded by the office.

I think this legislation in relation to naval matters needs to be overhauled. We ought not to do it up by piecemeal. I do not know, and I cannot tell from the casual reading of the bill, precisely what its provisions are. It may be a radical reconstruction of the naval service, or it may not be.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will permit me to explain right here, I will state that it does not create any radical change whatever. The first section provides that an officer receiving the thanks of Congress may be advanced in rank fifty numbers instead of thirty numbers, as is provided by the existing law.

The second section of the bill is necessary so that Captain Winslow may be made a commodore, notwithstanding that the number of commodores provided by law is already full. That is the whole object of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment which I propose will not interfere with the gentleman's object, but it will give a sort of recognition to the volunteer officers of the Navy. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to accept an amendment adding after the words "Navy or Marine corps" the words "either volunteer or otherwise."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I accept the amendment. The Committee on Naval Affairs has a bill before it contemplating that object.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Massachusetts cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I offer the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I trust that motion will not prevail. There is nothing radical in the bill. It is simply to enable the President to carry out the act in regard to Captain Winslow.

Mr. COX. I have not had a chance to discuss the bill here, but I think I can show the gentleman that it is objectionable.

The question was taken on Mr. Cox's motion, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation of the previous question the bill was engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 280) for the relief of George W. Murray; when the Speaker signed the same.

CHIEF ENGINEER KING'S REPORT.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the report made to him by Chief Engineer King in reference to the iron-clad vessels and dock-yards of Europe.

WESTERN NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. SPALDING, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred House bill No. 985, providing for a navy-yard at Cleveland, Ohio; House bill No. 594, providing for a navy-yard at Milwaukee, Wisconsin; House bill No. 587, providing for a navy-yard at Grand Haven, Michigan; House bill No. 611, providing for the establishment of a navy-yard at Chicago, Illinois; House bill No. 599, to provide for a navy-yard at Oswego, New York; House bill No. —, providing for a navy-yard at Erie, Pennsylvania; the memorial of the mayor and city council of Sandusky, Ohio, and various resolutions on the same subjects, reported a joint resolution providing for a commission to locate navy-yards.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It authorizes the President to appoint a commission, consisting of three competent officers of the Navy and two competent officers of the engineer corps of the Army, to examine the different ports and harbors on the northern and northwestern lakes, and on the navigable waters connecting the same, with a view to the establishment of one or more navy-yards and naval depots on such lakes and waters, according to the public exigency, and directs such commissioners to report to Congress on the first Monday of December next.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SPALDING moved the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. L. MYERS. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope my colleague will withdraw the motion.

Mr. L. MYERS. I think the commission provided for in this joint resolution should be directed to examine other sites for navy-yards—for instance, sites recommended by the President and Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The Northwest will do something for League Island at some other time. We want these navy-yards at the Northwest. I hope my colleague will withdraw his motion.

Mr. L. MYERS. At the suggestion of my friend from Pennsylvania I withdraw the motion.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I renew the motion. I desire an opportunity to say—

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable. There are two undebatable motions pending—the previous question and the motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table, and it was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation of the previous question the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALARIES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in view of the enormous expenses of the Government rendered necessary for the maintenance of the Army and Navy for the defense of the Government against the existing rebellion, and the onerous taxes imposed upon the people for the purpose of meeting such expenses, it is the sense of this House that no law ought to be enacted whereby the salary or compensation of any class of employes of the Government shall be raised or increased.

Objection was made, and the resolution was not received.

DISCHARGE OF COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the discharge of commissioned officers in the volunteer service, if desired by such officers, at the expiration of their original term of enlistment, without reference to intervening promotion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist on the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The next order is resolutions calling for information from the Executive Departments lying over under the rule.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that we have gone far enough with the regular order, and I move that the orders be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will do so.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. PENDLETON. When the committees were called this morning, I neglected to make a statement to the House, which I desire now to make—that the select committee on admitting heads of Executive Departments upon the floor of the House have made their report, which is in the hands of the printer; and I shall ask the action of the House on it at the earliest possible moment after the holidays.

Mr. FRANK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to yield to me a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will do so.

TRADE WITH CANADA.

Mr. FRANK, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House under what law goods, wares, merchandise, produce, &c., are permitted to pass from the United States through Canada, and again into the United States.

CARE OF REFUGEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in accordance with the proviso of the second section of the act of June 25, 1864, accounts of the superintendent and agents of the southern superintendency having charge of refugee Indians, for the second quarter of 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF GOLD BY GOVERNMENT.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House what, if any, amount of gold in the Treasury of the United States, not necessary for the payment of interest on the public debt, has been disposed of under the joint resolution approved March 17, 1864, what amounts and the various times when the same were disposed of, at what rates, and what agents were employed in the transaction.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that I understand altogether the object of this resolution, and therefore I insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the Secretary of the Treasury or on any officer connected with the Treasury Department; but I think that these facts are necessary for future legislation.

Mr. STEVENS. It may be so; and perhaps by to-morrow, when I shall have examined the matter, I may think so myself; but I prefer that the resolution should go over.

Mr. COX. If the resolution be offered now it will go over, under the rule, until to-morrow; and meanwhile the gentleman can examine it.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not object to its being offered, but to its consideration at the present time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be considered as offered, and will go over under the rules.

There was no objection.

BUREAU OF EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

Mr. PRUYN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into and report upon the expediency of creating in the Department of the Interior a bureau on the statistics of education.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and before that motion is put, I trust it will be understood by unanimous consent that no business shall be transacted after the committee rise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that understanding?

Objection was made.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall, without having made any special preparation, trouble the committee this afternoon with a few remarks in reference to that great question of "homogeneity" which seems to have so much attracted the attention of this House. When, sir, on Wednesday last, the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] rose in his place, I have no doubt that this House expected to hear an argument filled with statistics, sparkling with poetry, and glowing with eloquence, in favor of the constitutional amendment for the abolition of slavery. But, sir, how much were we disappointed to find that that able effort was vainly spent—may I be allowed to use that language?—in the attempt to show that "homogeneity" among the different sections of the same nation is a fallacy; that the slaveholding rebels of the aristocratic South and the liberty-loving fathers of this Republic had somewhat analogous causes of quarrel; that those southern rebels could not be conquered; that, had their complaints been listened to, this war might have been averted; that negotiations might cure our national ills; and yet no remedy was proposed provided the rebels would accept peace only on the basis of their independence.

Is it not singular, Mr. Chairman, that those who are acknowledged able statesmen and historians either do not know, or, in their forensic efforts against the right conceal, the distinction between a revolutionist and a rebel?

I presume, sir, since we last met we have all had the pleasure of getting off our stump speeches in our different districts and although I occupy that lamentable position, so that it may be said, "never again will I be heard here," yet I rejoice when I know I come not back, not because I hated treason too much, while others come not back because they loved it, "not wisely but too well."

Sir, we all love that doctrine that far down in the strata of society there exists the right of revolution. The true revolutionist is always the truly loyal man; he hates treason as much as tyranny, and both as he does Satan. What does such a citizen first do? He carries his case to the judiciary of the country; he pleads with and petitions the delegated sovereignty of his nation, wherever it may be lodged, again and again for a redress of grievances; and after all that he can do agreeably to either the form or spirit of law has failed—and his rights still trampled upon, his wrongs unredressed, tyranny yet inplacable, and despotism unmoved by his appeals, prayers, or petitions, then he resorts to his last remedy—then he asserts the rights to which his and nature's God entitle him, and justly becomes the revolutionist. Like such a man were the signers of the Declaration of Independence—they were revolutionists, not rebels.

The rebel is one who, having no real and often not even an imaginary grievance, but because he cannot always mold the social compact to which he belongs into that form which his diabolical heart, tyrannical head, and unclean hands desire, determines that such Government shall either be changed to suit his purposes or he will, without judicial sanction, without petition, forcibly, beligerently, and treasonably, set up a Government of his own, antagonistic to that to which he owes allegiance. Such a man, sir, is not a revolutionist, but a rebel, a traitor. He does not believe in the homogeneity of a nation unless it is homogeneous with himself. To such a class belong Breckinridge—John C., I mean—Lee, Wigfall, Jeff. Davis, and the devil, [laughter,] and, Mr. Chairman, all, all who agree with them.

We were asked, Why not have toleration? Toleration, it is said, is the very essence of religion. Yet, sir, who ever heard that true religion of any kind ever sanctioned slavery? Nay, more, who ever heard that a false religion sanctioned the slavery of its own votaries at all? Who ever heard that the doctrine of any kind of religion believed in the enslavement of its own race and religion?

It is said that the New Testament and the great Founder of our religion did not wish to destroy slavery. If that be so, was it not because it would produce a greater evil, and that was, the destruction of the Government in which it existed? So, sir, of us. So, sir, of the American Union. The love of country has ever been spoken of by the poet and orator as next to that principle which stands next to the love of God. Will you tell me that this country is an exception? Is it true that the American loves his country as much as the citizen of any other land? So true was it that the love of country was the paramount feeling of citizens of the United States, that we adhered to a Union even when some of the fathers of the country said that the Union protected slavery, and in order to save that Union we were sold to slavery. We bowed before it. We yielded; we yielded to its demands. But when slavery undertakes to destroy the life of the Union, as it has done; when that principle boldly declares that it is the assassin of this Union, the loyal man swears upon his country's altar that slavery itself shall die.

Why, sir, are we told that had their complaints been listened to this war might have been averted? Now, sir, to use a plain expression, I defy any man, any member of this House, any man who occupies a position either upon this floor or elsewhere in the country, I appeal even to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] and now is the time, and this the occasion, to tell me what cause of complaint the rebels have. It cannot be done. No honorable gentleman upon this floor can tell this House what cause of complaint the rebels have. They cannot do more than Alexander H. Stephens, the brightest intellect of the southern confederacy, could do. He admitted, down to November, 1860, that they had no cause of complaint. Why, then, assert it again and again, here and elsewhere?

Why, sir, not only in these Halls, but before the people, public men have stated that the South had claims to which the North refused to listen, listening to which we could have avoided this war. The honorable gentleman from New York, able as he is, great as are his powers, cannot mention one just cause of complaint which the South had.

But they tell us we cannot conquer the South. Ah, sir, I thought that the Chicago convention and its platform had been forgotten here, since the seal of condemnation had so significantly been placed upon it by the people. I had the pleasure of addressing the people of Philadelphia a few nights before the November election. I told them they must stretch stronger telegraph wires from pole to pole, for when the thundering voice of the Union majority should come over those wires they would be found too weak to carry the news. And, sure enough, the storm of Union victories came sweeping along and broke down those wires, so that away up in the country we were kept in suspense several days before we knew what was the exact result. True, we heard the thunder, but had to wait for the lightning. When it did come, however, it was all on one side. Yes, sir, there was homogeneity on that occasion, and it was of a very satisfactory character to all who loved country more than party.

Cannot conquer the South! It is but a reiteration of the doctrine laid down at Chicago, which started out with the assertion of a falsehood—a small one, not near as large a one as I should have expected from the source from which it emanated. It was asserted that four years of war had been a failure, while at that time four years of war had not existed. But the most stupendous falsehood is found in the fact that at the outbreak of the rebellion the rebels claimed about eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles of territory, while at the time of the holding the Chicago convention they could claim only two hundred and fifty thousand square miles. And now, I ask, was ever there so great a falsehood as that—a lie six hundred thousand square miles in extent? [Laughter.]

We cannot conquer the rebels! Sir, it looks very much now as though that prophetic declaration was about to be proved untrue. We are told that we must have an armistice, negotiation, must exhaust all the arts of statesmanship, and have a national convention. Sir, we have peace commissioners. They are Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, and Farragut. We have our national convention, and the delegates to it are the invincible soldiers and sailors of the Union, clothed in the royal purple of the nation, the Union blue; and they are now debating that question, and with all their powers are attempting its adjudication. Sir, they are calling the previous question on the rebels, and will soon table them effectually.

A national convention! Sir, that is but a repetition, as I said before, of the doctrine of the Chicago platform. And yet the whole matter is embraced in a negative. Even the able gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] after his eloquent argument—based upon many facts, I admit—thrilling as it did this House, what did he say? He says he does not know what he will do. He just says he proposes no remedy. That is the doctrine of negation, with all due respect to the gentleman. It is but the fish that was warmed into life in the sea of politics in which Buchanan existed. There was war before Abraham Lincoln took the oath of office or James Buchanan ceased to warm the presidential chair. Actual war existed in this country, and while that was the case, James Buchanan said, According to the Constitution of the United States, you have no right to secede, but according to that Constitution I cannot prevent you from seceding. Every school-boy knows that two negatives are equivalent to an affirmative, and therefore, "Go ahead," said James Buchanan. The doctrine of negation has ever since been the doctrine of that party; they are in favor positively of nothing, and negatively opposed to all things. Give me a positive man, give me a man who is in favor of some doctrine, and can give a reason for it.

But it was intimated by the gentleman from New York that after having exhausted everything else, falling back upon the reserved rights of this nation, in a certain contingency he might be in favor of war.

State rights! Will some able statesman please tell us when the States obtained their sovereignty? Will some student of the history of this Government and philosopher of the history of nations please inform us whether the colonies, separated as they were and tied to the mother country, had sovereignty before they were independent colonies and united as States of this Union? Will gentlemen please let us know whether, during their existence as colonies, they had any sovereignty at all; if they did not owe allegiance to the mother country, and were not bound to it by a ligament which held them until, by their own power as revolutionists, they tore it asunder? I say that when they became United States they were not born each independent and sovereign, but were all born together into the union of these States. I would like some gentleman to show us where he gets the doctrine of the sovereignty of each State. "Homogeneity!" Why, Mr. Chairman, before this Congress we hardly knew how to pronounce that word. It is almost like that other tremendous, jaw-breaking, terrible word, "miscegenation;" I do not know whether I have got it right. Homogeneity! And yet the honorable gentleman from New York, just at the close of his speech, in that eloquent appeal of his when he took Massachusetts upon her blind side and thrilled her to her very extremities, appealed to her, because he was born on some of her hills, to come to the rescue. He argued for an hour and twenty minutes against homogeneity, and how did he close? Ah! Mr. Chairman, how easily the ingenuity of the head is sometimes overthrown by the honesty of the heart. He appealed to the House to come together and vote together, you from Massachusetts, you from New York, and you from the West. What is that but an appeal to this House to become homogeneous? Homogeneity in the House of Representatives is a powerful thing; it is a thing of force; but homogeneity in the American nation is an absurdity, a chimera. Philosophers and geographers, we are told, are to utter no such nonsense as that. Mirabile dictu!

I see now why the Chicago convention adopted the planks and nominated the candidates it did. It was because that convention took up the idea of the honorable gentleman from New York, that the old scriptural notion that "a house divided against itself cannot stand" is an absurdity, and that the reverse is the way to make a powerful nation; that a house divided against itself is necessary for that purpose. Hence the Chicago convention had one candidate who was for peace and one who was for war; a candidate who wrote a letter of acceptance and one who wrote no letter of acceptance.

Sir, we have heard before, and perhaps in this very speech of the gentleman from New York, of the quarrel between the two roses, differing in disposition as much as in color; we have heard of the contest between the houses of York and Lancaster; but who, until the able speech of the honorable gentleman from New York, or rather until the assembling of the Chicago convention, ever before heard of the quarrel between the two Georges?

We are told that the head and front of that ticket—and here let me say, and I say it sincerely, that the second person on that ticket contained much the most head there was in it; they say, however, that the head and front of that ticket wrote a letter of acceptance. This doctrine of want of homogeneity was the idea of that convention, and it was upon that principle they expected their party to succeed. Now, what kind of a letter was that letter of acceptance? The design was to have it a war letter. Did you read that letter? If you read it downwards from the date, it does look a little warlike and runs smoothly along; but just turn it upside down and it is like what the Irishman said about the bumble bee; when it came at him head-foremost he cried out "What a beautiful bird it is," but when it backed up against him, "Oh, what hot fat the wee thing has." [Laughter.] And so of McClellan's letter of acceptance. But the idea was that this want of homogeneity was to be the great doctrine which should be successful; and no wonder the honorable gentleman from New York supported the party; he is sincere in his theory. Men who are sincere in their theories put them into practice. If it be true that nations should not be homogeneous, certainly it must be true that parties should not.

The second candidate on the platform, having more head, did not write a letter of acceptance, carrying out the doctrine of State rights. What business had the national committee of the great Democratic party with that nomination? That is a national doctrine. That is concentration. That is federalization. That is anti-State rightsization. But after the results of the first elections in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Indiana began to be known, a certain candidate for the Governorship of the State of New York said to himself, "General McClellan is gone; but there is a little chance for me if I can get something to show that both these candidates are for war." Hence, upon the State rights idea, the chairman of the New York State central committee writes a letter to the excellent gentleman who stands number two on the Chicago platform ticket, and thereto he receives a reply containing a larger gun of war than the famous letter of the ancient Napoleon; some people call him the modern Napoleon, but I call him the ancient one, for a deadlier man, a more deeply buried man than the former favorite of the soldiers is not to be found.

Jefferson Davis and Governor Brown do not seem to believe in the idea of homogeneity. They are quarreling with each other over the doctrine. The idea which Governor Brown and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] seem to have of a strong Government is that it shall not be homogeneous, but that there shall be kept up an eternal antagonism. Sir, that is the cause of all our troubles. We had an antagonism of words for a while. Now treason has brought that antagonism to the cannon's mouth, and the lover of his country swears that treason must "perish by the sword, because it has taken up the sword."

Perhaps I ought to ask, on this question of homogeneity, why it was that these two kinds of principles were enunciated at the Chicago convention. The leaders of the party, the able men, the sincere and eloquent men who believed that homogeneity was not a principle of strength in the Government, were shrewd enough to know that in order to get the votes of both wings of the Democratic party they must have a war plank and a peace plank. They knew that the peace plank would certainly carry all the peace men. Then they must have a little thunder, a little war, a little flag, some stars glittering on their banner, with which to go to the American soldier for his vote. Hence they got up these two propositions. They were not quite so successful, however, in curing their patients of the malady of Unionism, and infecting them with the disease of State rights, as an Irishman was whom I once heard of. He saw a friend of his in the street one day wheezing, coughing, and sneezing, just as a great many people did after the election. Said he to him, "Jimmy, you have a very bad cold." "Yes, Jake," said he, "a very large cold." "And I can tell you a first-rate cure," said the other. "I wish you would, for I have been using expectorants, and Holloway's pills, and cough candies, and such things, and I cannot afford them," said Jimmy. "Just follow my directions. Take about a gallon of first-rate whisky—not any of the tanglefoot article. Put it in a pot on the fire, and let it boil a good while. After you boil it for an hour or so put in a little sugar and a tablespoonful of water; not a drop more, or you'll spoil the mixture. After you've got it boiled down to half a gallon, put it in a bottle by your bedside. Take your hat off and hang it upon the bed-post. Then commence drinking the whisky and looking at the hat, and looking at the hat and drinking the whisky till you see two hats, and you're a sound man." [Laughter.]

Sir, you will allow me to change the illustration of the anecdote—to point the moral and adorn the tale. These gentlemen, expecting to get the votes of all Union lovers in the Democratic party and the votes of the peace men in the same party, hung up over the bedside of that great old party not one hat but two hats. And then they mixed up a mess of partisanship, and, after doing their followers with that, they thought they would change the recipe a little. They would look upon both hats, and, lying supinely and nicely on their bed, they would jump up on election day and cheer and hurrah for the success of the great Democratic party. Sir, the medicine failed. Why? Because there existed still, as I say there ever will exist in this country, far down in the hearts of the American people, the love of the Union which is greater than the love of party.

But, sir, men tell us sometimes that this is an abolition war, a Republican war. Sir, I tell you that if this were nothing but an abolition or Republican war, if this war had to depend upon our party alone, we would have gone under as a nation; we would have been submerged, lost, and lost forever. But, sir, there are noble men in that old Democratic party who will still, when you touch their love of country, "rally round the flag;" and they did it in this case. Sir, partisan effort failed of its purpose and of the effect it was designed to have.

We want "homogeneity" as a nation. Those who do not wish it as a party are welcome to the fruits which the want of it brings. The leaders of the Chicago peace party thought that convention was to be the cradle of a new-born child, and a great organization, and supposed that everything was going right; but when the winds of October and November came, they shook the bough upon which it hung, and, I was going to say, "down came baby and cradle and all." [Laughter.] We want the homogeneity of patriotism, and not of treason; of Unionism, and not of disseveration; that of geographical and social attachment, and not of physical disintegration and governmental antagonism. And, sir, after having attained that, we will take care of the defenders of the nation.

I was a little amused at that same Chicago platform when it declared, in glowing terms, sympathy with the soldiers of the nation. "When we get the power," said the members of that convention, "we will see that the soldiers are rewarded." Oh, cheap promise! "When they get the power!" I met a man on the street a few days before I came here, and he said, "Well, you used us up at the last election." "I think that we did," I replied. "But just wait," said he, "until 1868." Was not that a consolation? Oh! how sweetly we turn back to old memories, and how fondly hope looks forward to future party triumphs.

Sir, I ask this House who will take care of the defenders of the nation? Is it those who on every occasion, in every legislative assembly, by every judicial and executive power, obstruct the effort to grant to the soldiers the exercise of the right of suffrage? Can the soldiers justly look to such a party for aid, for sympathy, for reward? Now, Mr. Chairman, there is, I understand, one very troublesome question to be agitated in this House, and that is with reference to increasing the salaries of clerks in the Departments. I do not know whether I ought to commit myself on that question, but a man who may never come back here can talk pretty independently on these matters. Sir, if our party does what is right, I should be in favor of a very large increase of the salaries of those clerks, for I desire that those places shall be occupied by the brave men who have stood in the forefront of the battle, until a shattered arm or an amputated leg has qualified them for the position. Sir, if such a measure were adopted there is no extent to which this House would not be sustained in voting for an increase of these salaries. I merely allude to this incidentally, and to say that in such a way can we show our sympathy for the soldier and our disposition to stand by him and support him. I mean, sir, by recommending him in preference to all others for these places and positions, and then paying him well for his time, talents, and labor. And, sir, we must take care—and I think the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] yesterday announced this position—we must take care of the soldiers' orphan children, and of their widowed mothers. This is the duty of this House, and by measures to that end we can, as a party, show our sympathy for the defenders of our flag.

Do you tell me to be kind, to be lenient, to be merciful to those traitors in arms who have destroyed the lives of thousands and tens of thousands of our patriotic fellow citizens? Sir, look at our prisoners as they return from the South, with nothing upon their persons but the skin that covers their bones, and that pierced by the cruelty of slavery and of treason. Do you tell me to be kind to men who engage in such amusements as dragging the corpses of our soldiers from their graves, and afterward ornamenting their fiendish fingers by trinkets made from the bones of Union men? Do you tell me to be tolerant toward such fiends as these? Oh! sir, no wonder that John Wesley said that slavery is the "sum of all villainies." No wonder that Senator Sumner grew eloquent when talking of its barbarity. And no wonder that the American people have determined that it shall die.

Yes, sir, we must take care of the defenders of the nation. Sir, I suppose that the honorable gentleman from New York, and many of those on the other side who agree with him, ought to have knowledge of many a case, presented by the correspondence received at their desks from day to day; and, sir, when we visit those hospitals where we are called from time to time in the discharge of our duty to our constituents, we see the brave men who have periled all in defense of their country, and whom we are bound to defend by our legislation, sincerely, honestly, truly—not by whining, hypocritical declarations, as was done, I fear, by the Chicago convention. Sir, why did not the honorable gentleman from New York have some tears to shed over the sufferings of our brave soldiers? Why should we have lamentations and funeral panegyrics over that old institution of slavery, which, if not dead, is, like error wounded, "writhing in pain, and dying amid its worshippers?"

Sir, I hope gentlemen will take other cases to weep over. Going to the hospital near the battle-field of Gettysburg they might have seen the case of a young man who had left the home of his mother when the war began, he, too, her only support, sending her ten dollars per month in what some gentlemen call the depreciated currency of the country, he upon that battle-field was shot down, that shot coming from rebel hands and rebel guns, when laid upon his couch and carried to the hospital, though his cheek had never blanched before, though a tear had not coursed down his face—who ever hears a Union soldier complain?—yet when the surgeon said that he could live no longer, thinking of his widowed mother, tears coursed down his cheeks, and rising on his pallet bed exclaimed: "Who will take care of mother now?" The Christian commission, by its agent, was there to tell him what honorable gentlemen ought to tell him, what this House ought to tell him, and what the Union party does tell, that "God and a grateful country will take care of your mother now." That is the duty of our party. Such is the duty of this House.

Shall we look to the future? I should like to paint a picture of a few years to come. Let me advert to one thing, however, before I come to that. Did it belong to this doctrine of homogeneity, did it belong to the doctrine of antagonism that the Governor of New York, after his party said that they sympathized with the soldiers, went to the field and there by fraudulent ballot-boxes attempted to defraud them of the right of suffrage? Was that not a glorious punishment of Donahoe and Ferry? They were imprisoned for life. I hope that they will live for a hundred years. I hope when the soldier's child stands up in the mother's parlor and asks "What picture is that?" he will be told "That is the picture of Donahoe and Ferry, the miserable miscreants who were in favor of the Chicago platform and in favor of cheating the soldier out of his vote." I want them to live a hundred years. It is a glorious sentence. It is a good thing to speak about. It will afford fourth-of-July orations to the end of time. Our children and our children's children will talk about Donahoe and Ferry, and they will know to which party Donahoe and Ferry belonged.

Sir, there is to be a future of our country, a future more grand and more glorious than anything we have yet had, and I wish that all of us might live fifteen, twenty, or thirty years longer. Then when walking along our streets, let us ask that young man a question: "Where, young man, is your father?" See him hesitate and scowl as he answers, "My father, sir! I have not heard of my father since 1864, and then I was a child; they tell me, however, that my father was a copperhead." Look at that other young man; ask him where his father is? See how his eyes sparkle. "They tell me," he replies, "my father went down on board the Cumberland; the winds of the ocean sang the requiem of his death." There is another youth, and let us ask where is his father. He replies, "My father was with the legions of liberty on the 3d day of July, at the battle of Gettysburg, there, where the Union soldiers, under a Pennsylvania leader, vanquished the hosts of slavery, there my father was killed, and now lies buried in the national cemetery." Ask another where his father is. "My father, sir, in 1863, was with the western army under the gallant Hooker, and with the rest of them went up, and on, and up still to Lookout mountains, and there, above the clouds, with God looking down upon the legions of the Union, as He was inclosed in clouds when He gave the law to Moses, so the army of freedom was enveloped by the clouds when it gave forth the law of liberty by the thunders of its artillery. There, sir, my father died—upon that mountain top; and I thank God he did his duty." That is the way the Union men will speak in after days. You write an epitaph upon your grave-stone, which, after your death, will sound sweetly to the ears of your children. Ah, do not the members of this House many of them regret that they will at least have not served as you have who occupy that chair? [Mr. GARFIELD in the chair.] The fathers among us will have to regret that our children cannot say that we have fought the battles of our country. Ah, but when we are gone will not our children, when they come around our graves, be able to say "Our father loved his country?"

Mr. Chairman, I would like to trouble the House a little longer in showing the absurdity of this doctrine that it is best for a nation not to be homogeneous. Now, whether the gentleman from New York shall remain in this House for years to come or not; whoever, even of those whom the storm of Unionism may have swept away for the while, shall come back here, four, six, or ten years hence, will have learned this lesson from the people at least, that our people are homogeneous in this, that treason and slavery—being the same thing now—must die, because they have attempted the life of the nation. And when the cause of the present evil shall have been done away with the nation will go on and prosper and be still more prosperous, and then they will hear no more from able and eloquent statesmen of the absurd ideas of State rights, and that a want of homogeneity, a want of unity of purpose, and a want of unity of thought and action, is the strength of the nation.

Mr. ROSS. I had flattered myself that after the assembling of this session of Congress we would be able calmly and dispassionately to examine and investigate the great questions which are now agitating and distracting the public mind of the nation. I regret very much the temper and spirit with which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MYERS] has seen fit to entertain this House. I believe that gentleman and one other, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], are the only two who have seen fit to allude to certain individuals who were defeated in the late canvass, and to bring forward the old dead issues which were discussed in the late political campaign.

I say, sir, I flattered myself we would come together in such a temper and spirit that we would respond in some degree to the expectations of our constituents by aiming to give peace and harmony and prosperity again to this distracted country. But the gentleman has chosen a different line of argument. He has seen fit to allude to the action of a certain political party in their national convention at Chicago. He has, in my judgment, given a very wrong and improper construction as to the true theory of the Government itself. He ignores any rights in the States of this Union. I know it is becoming a favorite theory with gentlemen upon that side of the House that the States of this Union have no rights, but that we are a consolidated Government.

Sir, such a theory is not sustained by the history of this country. These States were sovereign and independent, but they surrendered certain portions of their powers and rights to the General Government, and the General Government is paramount and supreme to the extent of such delegated powers, while all the powers not conferred upon the General Government by the sovereign States themselves, are held and maintained by the States and the people respectively. So jealous were our fathers in framing the Constitution that they provided a limit to the extent to which the General Government might be permitted to go in the exercise of its functions.

Then, I take it, it cannot be successfully controverted that those powers not conferred on the General Government still remain in the States and in the people of this Union. There is nothing wrong in the formation of the Government. The ills which now surround our once glorious and happy country do not grow out of any inherent defect in the organic law under which we live. The Constitution of the country is all right; it is a perversion of the great principles of the Constitution that has brought on the difficulties which now surround and discompose this once glorious and happy country.

I say that the General Government is limited in its powers. Let the General Government exercise only those powers which are delegated to it, and, sirs, there will be no collision between the Federal Government and the respective States of the Union; we may go on, as we have done for seventy-five years past, the States revolving around the Union as a common center, without collision or conflict, and no State will ever desire to sever its connection with the General Government.

Why, sir, it was one of my boyhood's fancies that I would live to see the day when we would have an ocean-bound Republic. The idea that the character of our Government endangers its perpetuity is not true, if the Government is properly administered. We may take in Canada, and Cuba, and South America, and the islands of the sea, and they may harmoniously revolve with the States around the common center without any more danger of collision and conflict than there is in the solar system itself, if the Government is properly administered.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has seen fit to allude to the action of the Chicago convention, and very unjustly too. The Chicago convention did not resolve that the war had been a failure. What they did resolve was the simple truth that must be admitted and acknowledged by every gentleman upon the Republican side of the House, and that was that the war had proved a failure to restore the Union. That is what they said, and all they said. I should like to see any gentleman controvert satisfactorily the position there laid down by the Chicago convention that this war had proved a failure for the purpose of restoring the Union. No such thing has ever been done.

The gentleman speaks of the extraordinary love that he has for the soldier, and says that our pretenses of love for the soldier are hypocritical. I would call the attention of the committee and of the country to the action of this body at its last session upon some of these points. When I made a personal appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to permit me to introduce a proposition to amend a bill reported by him, increasing the compensation of soldiers up to twenty dollars a month, he refused to give me that privilege, but called the previous question, and the Republican majority sustained that call, thereby cutting off either amendment or debate upon the subject.

These men who love the soldier so well, as they tell you, will permit him to undergo the fatigues and hardships of camp life for the paltry sum of fifty-three and one third cents a day; and when we upon our side of the House asked that that compensation should be increased to at least half what the soldiers might get for ordinary labor at home, the majority upon the other side refused to permit us to make any such motion, or to entertain the proposition.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROSS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I want to ask him if he ever voted for an appropriation bill to pay the soldiers?

Mr. ROSS. I will answer that question. I have uniformly voted for every appropriation that has come up to pay the soldiers of the Army, unless it has been coupled with something so objectionable and obnoxious that I could not vote for it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I want to know if my colleague has voted for a single appropriation bill for the Army—to provide means for paying the Army?

Mr. ROSS. I have never voted for any appropriation for freedmen, or for putting the negro upon an equality with the white man in the ranks. Against all such measures I have voted; but I will tell my colleague, as he is one of the Committee on Military Affairs, that if he will introduce a bill, naked and alone, to increase the pay of soldiers, he will find no man in this House who will give it a more ardent support than I will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the gentleman to take the ground that the war is a failure, and that our soldiers are engaged in prosecuting an unholy and unjust and unconstitutional war. I understand that he never voted for an appropriation bill to provide means for paying the soldiers. It is true that he did upon one occasion offer an amendment or resolution to increase the pay of the soldiers to twenty or thirty dollars a month. The purpose of the gentleman in that proceeding is, it seems to me, very apparent. If the gentleman is opposed to the war, and thinks that the soldier is engaged in an unholy, unjust, and unconstitutional war—"a hellish crusade against liberty," as it has been denominated by some members on the other side—can he be justly regarded as a friend of the soldier who is engaged in the war? I think that the gentleman's constituents and mine well understand our relative positions.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman assumes too much when he says that I have ever declared that this was an unholy, an unrighteous, or an unjust war. I have never, at home or abroad, enunciated any such doctrine. I have said that, in my humble judgment, if this Government had been properly administered this bitter cup might have been turned from our lips, and we might not have been required to drain it to the very dregs. Such is my judgment in regard to this matter. But I am the last man, with one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand of our gallant Illinois soldiers in the field, to turn my back upon them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I want to ask my colleague how he voted on the bill reported last session from the Committee on Military Affairs, for the speedy punishment of those infernal rascals known as guerrillas, who shoot our soldiers in the back as they are dragging their weary and blood-stained feet to the hospitals in the rear. Did my colleague vote for that bill or against it?

Mr. ROSS. The gentleman seems desirous of breaking the thread of my discussion, but I will tell him—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not at all; but you are on the question of the soldier.

Mr. ROSS. The bill introduced for the purpose of giving to the commanders of petty posts, perhaps not above the grade of lieutenant, the authority to execute men called "guerrillas." I did vote against, and I would vote against it again, because all that was necessary, even without its passage, was to report to the authorities at Washington, and thus get a confirmation of the sentence. What kind of war would we have if that policy were to be pursued? There would be a system of vengeance and retaliation in both armies. The war would become a ten-fold more cruel and bloody war than it now is. Consequently I voted against that bill. But I have voted for the soldier. I have voted to increase his pay; and I have appealed to members of this House to increase his pay. And I ask the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] how he will explain to his constituents why, when I proposed to increase the soldiers' pay twenty per cent. he voted to sustain the previous question, thereby keeping one hundred and fifty thousand Illinois men in the field on fifty-three and a third cents a day, while their wages are worth from one dollar and a half to two dollars a day at home? I want my colleague to answer this to his constituents at home.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does my colleague desire an answer to it now?

Mr. ROSS. I do not propose that you shall make a speech now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am willing to answer that now. I was one of those who voted for and advocated the payment to our soldiers of all that they could be paid with the means at the disposal of the Government. I always voted for appropriation bills to provide means to pay the soldier. I voted for tax bills. I voted for every revenue bill to provide means for carrying on this war.

My colleague complains that the soldiers are paid too little. Why, sir, there is not a Government on earth that pays its soldiers half as well as the Government of the United States pays its soldier. There is not a Government on earth that feeds or clothes its soldiers so well as the Government of the United States does. Nothing like it. Our soldiers now get sixteen dollars a month, their clothing, and rations. You cannot find any other Government on the face of the earth that pays its soldiers ten dollars a month, with rations and clothing.

Mr. ROSS. Then I understand this matter differently from my colleague, and I will leave him to settle it with his constituents. He thinks that the pay of the soldier is high enough; that we have gone ahead of all other Governments in that respect. He is willing to say to one hundred and fifty thousand Illinoisans in the field, who, if at home, could command from one dollar and fifty cents to two dollars a day for farm labor, that they shall stay in the service, and bear the trials and hardships of camp life for fifty-three and one third cents per day. That is what my honorable colleague says to his constituency. For my part, sir, I think that the noble boys in the field, who are bearing the toils and hardships of war, are entitled to at least as much compensation as they would receive for ordinary labor at home.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give way to his colleague?

Mr. ROSS. If he wants to ask me a question, I will give way.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have served with our soldiers for nearly two years in the field—

Mr. ROSS. I do not propose to give way for the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose to premise my question by a few words.

Mr. ROSS. I cannot yield to the gentleman, except to ask briefly a question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I want to ask my colleague whether any Illinois soldiers have ever complained to him of the lack of sufficient pay?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Of twelve thousand from my district not one has ever made any such complaint.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have never in my life received a letter from a soldier complaining in regard to the insufficiency of his pay.

Mr. ROSS. I suppose that the reason why the gentleman has not received any application from soldiers for increase of pay is, that the soldiers have understood that he is opposed to such increase. I have received such letters in abundance from my constituents, asking that they should at least be allowed such pay as will enable them to send home to their wives and children a small pittance to keep them from becoming objects of charity.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Why did not my colleague have those letters or petitions referred to the Committee on Military Affairs? We never saw any of them.

Mr. ROSS. I showed one of those letters to the honorable gentleman last winter and he turned me off very coolly.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The truth is these complaints come from the men who oppose the war; they come from those of the party represented on the other side of the House who have resolved upon everything that can embarrass the Government, prevent the success of the Army, and throw obstacles in the way of the prosecution of the war.

Mr. ROSS. I think, sir, that the meager pay of the soldier is manifestly unjust. I have little faith in loud professions of love for the soldier, when those who make them refuse to allow him enough pay to sustain his wife and children at home, so that they are left naked and starving.

But they did increase the pay of the soldier! They increased it by the extraordinarily munificent sum of ten cents a day! Mr. Chairman, I think that the appellation that was formerly applied to Mr. Buchanan, when he was a candidate for the presidency, might with propriety be applied to the other side of the House; they might be called the "ten cent" party. They actually, in their munificence, increased the pay of the soldier ten cents a day—enough to buy a quarter of a yard of common calico, or a quarter of a yard of brown domestic muslin, to assist in clothing his wife and little ones at home. This is the love that these men have shown toward the soldiers in our Army.

I will tell you another thing that was done at the last session. We passed through this House a bill introduced by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to increase the pay of the pensioner to eleven dollars a month. It had been eight dollars before. As all the necessities of life had been raised in price by the war, we thought that increase in the amount of pension was demanded. I knew that in Illinois widows and orphans of our soldiers who had fallen in battle had in some instances become objects of charity in the neighborhood where they lived. I was not willing that they should be so regarded. We passed in this House a bill to increase the amount of pension to eleven dollars a month. When that bill went to the Senate, that body by a majority vote—a party vote—struck out the provision for eleven dollars a month and reduced the amount to eight dollars a month. This House, by a majority vote, concurred in that amendment. By this circumstance the armless and legless soldiers throughout the country, and the widows and orphans of soldiers who have died in the service, may know and understand the reason why they do not get eleven dollars a month instead of eight dollars a month. It is because the party in power in this House so voted and determined.

But, sir, the Senate made another amendment to that bill. You know, sir, that, as our law previously stood, the widow of a soldier, in order to draw her pay and pension, was obliged to produce a certificate of record to establish the fact of her marriage. There have been hanging in the Department hundreds of applications of widows who, because they were married in the rebellious States, or for some other reason, found it inconvenient or impossible to get a certificate, and who therefore cannot get a pension.

But this House and the Senate last winter proposed a new plan, which was, that persons living together as husband and wife for the space of two years should be entitled to a life pension under the pension act. That was to be considered as prima facie evidence of marriage. Strange to tell, they did not apply that beneficial privilege to the white woman; but a black woman who proved that she had lived with a negro two years is placed upon a higher and more lofty position than the white women of this country, because the one can get a pension on such evidence, and the other is compelled to have record evidence. It is the ground agreed upon by the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, it is not in accordance with my feelings to indulge in the discussion of these old questions which have passed into history. As a Representative of the people in Congress, I should have never alluded to them if other gentlemen had not brought them up. The great practical question which the people are desirous their Representatives should act on, is that in some way we should have a restored and united Government. I am not one of those who believe that there is any necessary conflict in the institutions of this country. I know the doctrine has been enunciated by distinguished men, that there was an irrepressible conflict in the institutions of this country. I say, sir, that it is a slander upon the patriot fathers who framed and molded those institutions. They did not make them as temporary experiments of government. They made them to last and endure as long as water ran and grass grew. They did not imagine that they were forming a Government which, in the first century, was to totter to its fall. I say that it is a slander upon our fathers. It is a base calumny upon the Government to say that there is any irrepressible conflict or collision in our institutions. This Government may go on, and go on till time shall be no more, without collision or conflict, if we confine ourselves within the legitimate jurisdiction of the Government itself. There is the trouble.

Mr. Chairman, the question of slavery was not one of those which were delegated by the States to Congress. Congress has not that power, that power having been reserved to the States themselves. I do not stand here as the apologist for slavery. I recognize the soundness of the doctrine enunciated by Stephen A. Douglas, when he said that he did not care whether Congress voted slavery up or down, for the reason that it is none of our business. When we govern ourselves in Illinois, we are content. We have no right to attempt to control the domestic institutions of Kentucky and Missouri. That is a sovereign right which they have never surrendered to the General Government.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the honorable members of this House, whether we had not better content ourselves with standing by the Government as it came from the hands of our fathers? We recognize the principle that each State has the right to control and manage its own domestic institutions in its own way. It is not hard to get back to the fundamental principles of our fathers, under which we prospered and flourished for the last seventy-five years. It is a simple question of attending to our own business, and letting every one else alone. That is all. When you narrow down the contest, it comes to this, that each State shall attend to its own affairs, and leave those of others alone. I submit to the consideration of the House whether it is not better to so determine.

We are engaged in one of the most extraordinary wars the world has ever seen. Is it not a time that we should attempt to conciliate and harmonize the public sentiment of the country? I believe that there may be reconciliation, and that we may grow happy and prosperous as in years past. Such is the desire of my heart. It is the great object I have in view, and I shall do all I can to bring about so desirable a result.

A time of civil war is no time in which to change the institutions of this country. I know that alterations of the Constitution are urged. This is no time to change our organic law. Let us stand by our Government as our fathers made it. Let us abide by the Constitution as it came from their hands. Why, I would as soon trust Washington, and Jefferson, and Adams, and Franklin, as I would the distinguished gentlemen of this House, for whom I have so high a regard. And I submit to the House whether it is not better that we should attempt, by some conciliating means, to restore this Government. I know gentlemen tell us "You talk about compromise; we are opposed to compromise." Now, I want you to think a little about that, as calm and candid men. You say you are opposed to compromise. Do not you know that this Government was founded on compromises? Do not you know that this Government could never have been formed except by compromise? Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Franklin, and their illustrious contemporaries were not afraid of compromise. They were men who were willing to compromise. The Government was not only made by compromises, but it has been maintained by compromise from that day to this.

In 1833, when there was danger of a collision in this country, you know the action of Henry Clay, the idol of his party at that day. He came forward and proposed to reduce the tariff to twenty per cent. as a peace offering. You recollect that in 1820, when the Missouri question was distracting this country, Henry Clay came in with his compromise and peace measures, extending the line of 36° 30' to the Pacific ocean.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask my colleague what kind of a compromise he would propose, which would lead in his opinion to a restoration of the Union. I have failed to ascertain from him or from anybody else the sort of compromise which will answer.

Mr. ROSS. I am wedded to no particular plan. What I desire is a restoration of the Government, and I will tell the gentleman what I believe I would do. I believe I would ask an armistice and a national convention with a view to settling our difficulties, and in my judgment the people of this country never would permit that national convention to adjourn until they had agreed upon peace and a restored Union.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If my colleague were a member of that convention what sort of a basis would he propose by way of compromise?

Mr. ROSS. I would propose the old Constitution, the old Union, the old flag, and the old Democratic party to administer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. They had all that when they went out. They had the whole of that under Buchanan.

Mr. VOORHEES. I object to further interruption.

Mr. ROSS. I am not disposed to experiment in this matter a great deal. We got along very well for seventy-five years, and I do not want a better condition of things than we had then. We had peace, nationality, and such an extent of prosperity as never before blessed any nation. We astonished ourselves at the magnitude of our prosperity.

Now, what is the use of throwing all that away by experiment? What is the use of attempting to better a condition of things already good enough? Daniel Webster, I think it was, said it was best to let well enough alone.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Did not the rebels have the old Constitution, the old flag, and the old Democratic party in power?

Mr. VOORHEES. I object to interruption.

Mr. ROSS. And the trouble is that you turned them out. We had peace and prosperity all over this country during the reign of the Democratic party. They had the reins of this Government for sixty years, and we never infringed upon the rights of any man. Our name was respected at home and abroad, upon land and sea. Wherever our flag took our citizens, their rights were respected. When these gentlemen made an onslaught upon the Democratic party on account of the Mexican war we did not imprison any of them, or stop their presses; but gave them the right of the writ of habeas corpus. And I propose to extend that right to them again when we get into power once more. What we want now is the restored flag, the old Union, the old nationality.

I know those gentlemen tell us all the time there can be no compromise made. I have heard it said upon every street corner that if you would give the rebels a sheet of blank paper, and let them write out the terms of peace, they would not write any terms except those of absolute independence.

Now, sir, I want it distinctly understood that I never have been in favor of a division of this Government, and I am not now. I want the whole Union—every part of it. But I would rather have it by compromise than by fighting. I would rather have restored peace and union by compromise than by war.

Gentlemen know very well the danger which we are all the time incurring by the prosecution of this civil war. The despotisms of the Old World do not love us. Some people thought it strange that they should take the side of the South, but there was nothing strange about it. They took the side of the South because the South was the weakest; and whenever we are the weakest they will take our side. They want us destroyed and to see this Government used up.

Well, now, we have run a great many narrow risks since this war commenced of complications with foreign Governments. We have been on the very eve of such difficulties all the time. I ask gentlemen if it would not be better to do as Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Jackson and Clay and Webster and all those great men did, and say that we are not too great to compromise. They were not too great to compromise; they were willing to compromise; they compromised in making the Government, and in upholding and maintaining it.

Gentlemen asked, "what do you want?" I want whatever is right and fair, and I want a national convention of honest men to determine what is right and fair. I think we have been in some degree, perhaps, in the wrong. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that you cannot point to anything that the South had a right to complain of. I ask if they had no right to complain of the violation of the principle of the fugitive slave law. It was a constitutional provision and was the law of the land. But you know that they passed "personal liberty bills" in New England by which they confined persons in prison who undertook to carry out that law and attorneys who would take the cases of those men who attempted to recover fugitive slaves. I ask if there is no cause of complaint in that. I think there is; and these things might be settled.

I am willing to let them have their institution of slavery until they get tired of it. I do not want it in Illinois, but I take it that it is the right of each State in the Union to have and maintain slavery if they desire it. When you strike down this right you violate the principle of the Government, which is that the States shall have the right to determine for themselves the kind of institutions they will have.

Now, what objection can there be to having a national convention? Gentlemen tell us that we cannot get peace from the South by such means. Well, what hurt will it do to make an offer of it? Suppose we make the proposition. You know that a great many men think differently on the subject. I have thought at times that the reason why you did not make any propositions of peace with a restored Union was that you were afraid they would be accepted. That is my theory; I hope I am mistaken.

Now, I am not disposed to give up this Government any more than you are. It is my Government; I intend to maintain it in every way I can; but I submit to you in all candor if we cannot do it better by compromise than by fighting. What use will this southern country be to us after our armies have conquered it? We must have the consent of the people before it will be of any service to us. Your bill which provides for the appointment of governors and other officers there is in violation of the principle of our Government. The principle on which our Government is founded is the consent of the governed. You must have the hearts and affections of the people or you cannot maintain a Government like this. We set out on the hypothesis that we could maintain a Government here without any great standing army or powerful navy. It worked beautifully for seventy-five years. We did not tax the people as they do in the despotisms of the Old World to keep up a large standing army and a navy. The people loved the Government. They did not require an army to keep them in subjection. When you have to force the people to remain under the government, you must have a large army and navy, which necessarily involves great expenditures of money and high taxes.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, whether we ought not now to fall back on common sense and on the principles of the Government as our fathers made it. Let us settle with these men in the South if we can do it on honorable and fair terms. Then we will not have cause to be afraid of foreign intervention. I want to maintain the old Monroe doctrine which has grown obsolete since the present Administration came into power. I want to restore that great principle. Suppose we settle up our own internal difficulties and place Grant, Sherman, Lee, and our other great generals with consolidated and combined armies in Mexico and run the French out—can we do anything else that will so nationalize the popular heart and give peace and quiet to the country? Let us not be wasting our time and energies in quarreling about old issues until some foreign Government steps in and takes our liberties from us. These foreign Governments do not like us. They would like to see the failure of this experiment of free government on this continent.

I submit, then, Mr. Chairman, whether it would not be better for us to have a national convention.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. EDEN] objects to his being interrupted.

Mr. ROSS. I have no objection to answering any legitimate and proper question.

Mr. EDEN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. My question is this: how are you to get at this national convention?

Mr. ROSS. I think that if a national convention were proposed by our Government, and refused by the confederate government, there would be some difference in the feelings of some men in the country in regard to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. By what authority can our Government propose it—where is the power?

Mr. GANSON. In "military necessity." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. I suppose there is the same kind of authority for it as that under which the war is prosecuted—the Executive will. I do not see any objection to the proposition.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. What power is there to call such a convention without violating the Constitution, which provides that, on application of two thirds of the States, Congress shall call a national convention?

Mr. ROSS. I think there is no difficulty in the matter whenever this is desired. But the trouble with the gentleman from Massachusetts and his friends is that they do not want such a thing.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I want to proceed according to the Constitution.

Mr. ROSS. So do I. I am for the Constitution and for the Union, maintaining it in all its parts just as it was, with such amendments as we may see fit to make. If it is defective I am willing that it shall be amended. There is nothing strange or novel in my position. I have been for the Union all the time. I have not been very fierce in the prosecution of this war. [Laughter.] I have no disposition to disguise my feelings on the subject. I will tell you why I have not been. Because I thought the war might have been honorably avoided. I knew that peace propositions introduced by Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Kellogg, of Illinois, were voted down in this House. I noticed that when Mr. Clemens, of Virginia, introduced a proposition to submit the Crittenden compromise to a vote of the people of the United States the majority in this House voted it down. And I was irresistibly led to the conclusion that they desired war and not peace.

Another thing brought me to this conclusion. At the time the peace convention was in session in Washington city, a distinguished member of the Republican party telegraphed home, "Send us stiff-backed men or none." Said he, "Illinois and New Jersey are caving in. Without a little blood-letting this country will not be worth a curse." From these facts I have been drawn to the conclusion that there were many in the country who desired war and not peace. I am as willing as anybody to have war when it is necessary to have it. Whenever I am satisfied that this Government cannot be maintained except by war, then I am for war. While it can be maintained by peaceful measures, I prefer to avoid war. I have no disposition to disguise the fact that I prefer a peaceful adjustment of our difficulties rather than war. If any gentleman would rather adjust them by war than by peace, he is entitled to his opinion. I will ask my colleague [Mr. Farnsworth] whether he would prefer now that our difficulties should be settled by peace or by war. Let him just answer that question without a speech.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No man in the wide world excels me in a strong desire for peace. Every soldier, and I take it, every reasonable man, wants peace. I think, however, that the only way out of our present troubles is to conquer a peace. I am entirely satisfied that the method proposed by my colleague [Mr. Ross]—an armistice and a convention—would simply lead to a further prolongation of the war. Being entirely satisfied of that, and inasmuch as the rebels may at any time, by simply laying down their arms and abiding by the Constitution, have peace, with all the rights that they ever had, except such as they have forfeited by their rebellion, I see no necessity for an armistice or a convention, which, in my opinion, would subserve no purpose except to throw obstacles in the way of the further prosecution of the war.

Mr. ROSS. The gentleman has not answered the question which I propounded.

Now, I would like to exhaust all peaceful measures before we should prosecute this war much longer. We have been about four years engaged in war, and it has been crippling our resources very greatly. We are heaping upon our people a very heavy debt. Now, if there is any possibility of avoiding this it appears to me that we should all concur in an effort toward that end. Why not try it? Why not see whether we cannot make peace? Gentlemen on the other side of the House are not so much greater than Washington and Jefferson and Adams and Jackson and Clay and Webster. All these were willing to compromise. How does it happen that such superior wisdom has sprung into existence within the last three or four years?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How did Jackson compromise with South Carolina nullification?

Mr. ROSS. Well, I will tell you. Jackson issued his proclamation against the nullifiers, which was all right; but he concurred in the peace measures offered by Mr. Clay about the same time. While he sent forth the sword, he also sent forth the olive-branch. That is what I want now.

A MEMBER. It is what we have now.

Mr. ROSS. Why do you not issue a proclamation telling these men in rebellion that if they will lay down their arms they shall be entitled to all the rights which they enjoyed under the Government before the war? In my judgment, the reason is that you are afraid that it will be accepted. I am afraid that there are too many in this country who want to prosecute this war for the purpose of place and emolument. I fear that this is the great danger.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, whether we had better not bury, for the time being, our party prejudices, rise above party, and act like patriots for the restoration of our Government. I am willing to join hands with any who are in favor of a restored Government as our fathers made it. I am willing to cooperate and consult, to do whatever may be best to secure the restoration of our glorious Government. I want to hand it down as a precious legacy to my children. Houses, or lands, or anything else that we can give them, are worthless when compared with free government and free institutions. No man in this House is more attached to our form of government and the institutions under which we live than I am; none would make greater sacrifices to maintain them.

Gentlemen on the other side taunt us with the fact that we have been beaten at the last election. Be it so. We submit gracefully. We come here to do what we can to restore the Government. The great interests of the country now hang tremblingly in the balance in your hands. The responsibility of determining whether we shall have a restored Government rests upon you. I will throw no obstacles in the way. I will do what I can to aid the Union men of this country in the restoration of this Government. I am a Union man without an "if" or a "but." I am for the Union, whether slavery lives or dies. I do not care whether slavery be voted up or voted down. I am for the Government and the Constitution and the Union as our fathers gave them to us. I would ask my colleagues here whether the time has not come when we should bury our party prejudices beneath the rubbish of ages, and come together as true men to consult for the restoration of our Government and an honorable and enduring peace.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think that the time has come when these old rusty party prejudices should be buried, and that the time has come also when this rusty old fossil of a party should be buried, as it has been pretty much by the votes of the people.

My colleague talks about his love for the soldier. Strangely it happens that the soldiers do not reciprocate that attachment. We find from the votes in our own State of Illinois, as in every State of this Union, whether the soldiers have been at home or in the field, they have spewed the Chicago platform and its nominees out of their mouth with disgust; and my colleague is the only one left of all my colleagues on that side of the House to tell the tale. He has taken the first opportunity to tell it, and he tells it well. I am not surprised that he has gathered a portion of courage from the vote in his district. He is the "last of the Mohicans," the last of the tribe. [Laughter.] I have no disposition to take his scalp, for I am entirely willing that one should be left.

Mr. ROSS. Let me correct my colleague. I am not the only one, for there are three Democratic members from Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I said that my colleague is the only one of those now here who is left to tell the tale. That is true.

My colleague talks about an armistice and a convention to arrange terms of peace. Peace at a time like this! Shall we lay down our arms and recall our victorious soldiers from the field just at the time when light is breaking through the rebellion; when we see around it and through it, and it is becoming transparent; when its resources are tumbling; when the bottom of the tub is near out; at a time when we have, as the President says, detached a large army, holding on to what we have conquered, to go curving back and forth through the confederacy without let or hindrance; at a time when Sherman has made his triumphant march through Georgia, when his guns are thundering away at Savannah, when it is a question of time, and that brief time, when Savannah falls, when he sweeps up and takes Charleston, and then, unstayed in his onward progress, joins the veteran hosts of Grant at Richmond? At such a time my colleague talks about an armistice! He talks about withdrawing his army. I regret that any voice from my own State, that glorious, gallant State of Illinois which has given so many soldiers to this war, and has so many more to give—I regret, sir, that any voice from that State should croak about an armistice and peace. That, too, when the people have thundered their verdict in his ears, and when that verdict has reached the ears of the despots across the water, who, he says, are wishing so anxiously for us to fall to pieces. Yes, sir, and that is the reason they gave every aid and comfort to the gentleman's party in the last election, because they want us to tumble to pieces.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of peace, as I have already told my colleague. There is not a soldier among all the gallant host from Illinois, who marches back and forth upon his silent watch at midnight and thinks of his home and fireside, who does not pray for peace; but there is not one of them, with all their anxiety for peace, who is willing to turn his back to his foe at this moment for armistice and peace. He the friend of the soldier! The soldier does not reciprocate his attachment by any manner of means. The soldier does not want an armistice, for in it he sees a prolongation of the war. He can see no peace in anything patched up by the builders of the Chicago platform. He believes it would result in chronic war. I, for my part, see no road to peace but the road of war; and I am in favor of prosecuting this war day by day, month by month, and year by year, if necessary. We have shown that our resources are scarcely touched, and we have made the rebel flag bite the dust.

My colleague talks about the Constitution and the flag. All that is necessary is for the rebels to submit to that Constitution and flag, lay down the instruments of war and take up those of peace, and the war is ended. Why, sir, they had the old Constitution; they had the old flag, and I am sorry to say it, they had the old Democratic party in power when they broke up the Union. They had the friend of my colleague, James Buchanan, at the head of the Government, and his thieving, traitorous crew in all the Departments.

I failed to get an answer to the question I put to my colleague as to what kind of a compromise he would propose. I have heard these gentlemen talk much about compromise. But, Oh no, it is an armistice, a convention; and then they will see what terms they can make. What do they propose to compromise? What have we done? The gentleman says they complain of our action in reference to the fugitive slave law. But it happens that those States which had the most reason to complain have not gone out of the Union. Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri did not complain; or, if they did, they did not complain to the extent of seceding. South Carolina was the leader in this rebellion—the first State that seceded. Will my colleague tell me how many slaves South Carolina ever lost by reason of the non-execution of the fugitive slave law?

Mr. ROSS. Did not the former Governor of Ohio, the present Postmaster General, say he would resist the execution of the fugitive slave law by force?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not know what he said; I never heard him say so; but if he did, I do not know that that is any reason why South Carolina should secede.

I hear it said by gentlemen on this side that South Carolina lost ten slaves in thirteen years. I did not suppose it was so many; but those she did lose were those who concealed themselves on board of vessels at Charleston, or who were barreled up, or stuffed into old dry-goods boxes, to be sent off. She never lost by the non-execution of the fugitive slave law. Nor did Georgia. It was said on the floor of this House, by the leaders of this rebellion, that it was not that that they cared for. I heard a member from Alabama say, upon the floor of this House, that he came here, as a member of that Congress, for the purpose of breaking up the Union, and not on account of the non-execution of the fugitive slave law. And I have lived to hear my colleague from the old glorious State of Illinois get up upon the floor of the House and apologize for those men who, with lips yet warm with the oath they had taken upon the Holy Evangel of Almighty God that they would support the Constitution and perform their duties as members of Congress to the best of their ability, made their boasts openly and above-board, under a Democratic Administration, and in the presence of those voting with the Democratic party, that they came here only for the purpose of trying to break up the Government.

I rose only to throw out these few remarks by way of brief reply to my colleague, and I yield the floor.

Mr. COX obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the President's annual message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, announced to the House that the Senate insist upon their amendments to the bill of the House (No. 51) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs," agree to the conference committee asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. SUMNER, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. BUCKALEW, the committee of conference upon the part of the Senate.

OVERLAND MAIL TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. DAILEY asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to furnish to this House copies of all advertisements by the Post Office Department for the letting of the late contract for carrying the overland California mail, with a list of all bids and bidders under any or all of said advertisements; also, a copy of all correspondence with the Department in relation to said contract, the date when, and to whom, the contract was finally let.

Objection was made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. EDEN, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of M. W. Twiss; and the same were referred to the Committee of Claims.

HEIRS OF JOHN A. STEVENS.

Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of John A. Stevens, deceased, of Springfield, Missouri; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

And then, on motion of Mr. COX, (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with law, a statement of the appropriations to the credit of that Department July 1, 1863, and the unexpended balances on the 30th of June, 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in obedience to law, copies of the accounts of the superintendent and agents charged with the disbursement of the funds for the relief of the refugee Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Indians for the second quarter of the year 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COLLAMER presented a petition of Harper & Brothers, and others, and a petition of George W. Matsell & Co., and others, citizens of New York, praying for the repeal of the fourth section of the "Act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864, imposing restrictions upon mailable matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of surgeons and assistant surgeons in the United States Army, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of clerks in the Treasury Department, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of Benjamin S. Compton, praying for compensation for seven hundred and eighty-two bales of cotton alleged to have been seized by a military expedition under the command of General Ransom, and shipped to Memphis and sold on account of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Edwin M. Chaffee, praying for an extension of letters patent granted to him August 31, 1836, for the "machine patent," so called, used in the manufacture of india rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of R. B. Hughes and others, bailiffs of the United States courts in the District of Columbia, praying for an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to present a petition on behalf of the widow of Rev. Samuel Hibben. It appears that he was duly commissioned chaplain of the fourth Illinois volunteers, and served as such, and died in the service, but by reason of the failure to have him mustered in according to the regulations, he has not been paid. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 597) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, reported it without amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

A bill (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit;

A bill (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864;

A bill (H. R. No. 625) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1864; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) providing for the appointment of a commission to locate one or more navy-yards and depots on the north-western waters.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 358) to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 478) for the relief of Charles M. Pott; and

A bill (H. R. No. 603) to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from public stores.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, commonly known as the amendment to the whisky tax, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment. The committee have also instructed me to ask for its present consideration, so that it may be disposed of before the adjournment, as otherwise the effect of it will be lost.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section fifty-five of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, by striking out the word "February," wherever it occurs in that section, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "January."

Mr. SHERMAN. It is due to the Committee on Finance that I should make a brief statement in regard to this matter, as it is a very important question. The bill proposes to anticipate the two dollars a gallon tax on spirits, so as to make it commence on the 1st of January instead of the 1st of February. Several objections are very strongly urged to the measure. One is that it is a change of legislation, indicating a want of stability in the action of Congress on the subject. It is also urged that it will interfere with the arrangements already made by the manufacturers of spirits in anticipation of the existing law, that it operates as a snap-judgment, to use a cant phrase, on these men engaged in an ordinary business.

On the other hand, it is alleged, that if this bill be not passed, the manufacture of whisky will be enormously increased, probably to the amount of ten or fifteen million gallons, which will pay but a dollar and a half a gallon, and thus, at a diminished rate of duty, fill the market for months to come, and that the effect would be that no whisky would be manufactured after the 1st of February, when the increased tax is to take effect under the present law. The committee, after a very patient and careful examination of this subject, feeling that there was a great deal to be said on both sides, thought that the interests of the Government would be subserved by passing the bill, that it was better to have the matter settled, and settled permanently at once, rather than to have it continued so as to make uncertainty and confusion in the manufacture of whisky and uncertainty in the revenue. If this increased tax be made to take effect on the 1st day of January, the Government, as a matter of course, will get two dollars on every gallon of whisky manufactured after that time. If it be postponed until the 1st of February, according to the law as it now stands, the Government, it is true, will get one dollar and a half on the largely increased manufacture during January, but none will be manufactured after the 1st of February for some time, until the stock on hand shall be exhausted.

It is a question on which there was a difference of opinion in the Committee on Finance, but we deemed it our duty to report the bill for the action of the Senate. I make this statement in behalf of the committee, without giving my own opinion, so that the Senate may take such action as they may deem proper. It is proper for me to say further, that whatever action is taken should be taken to-day, so that the bill may be disposed of at once. If it be postponed after to-morrow, the bill falls as a matter of course.

Mr. POMEROY. It may perhaps be interesting to the Senate and to the country to know whether this is all the legislation that is intended on this question. At the last session we had it up twice, and I supposed the settlement made in the bill we then passed was final, but of course I have no objection to any improved legislation on the subject. The point with me is to learn whether it is understood by the Committee on Finance that the bill is to terminate our legislation on this question for the session.

I have always believed that this manufacture would bear an increase of tax, even beyond two dollars a gallon. I know that when we first began to tax it, we commenced at twenty cents, and that was struggled against. We then went up to sixty cents, and then to a dollar, and prospectively to a dollar and a half, and finally to two dollars as the rate from the 1st of February next. I should like to have the final point reached at once in one measure, and then let the country rest.

I do not wish to embarrass this bill, but I believe that we might put $2 50 a gallon tax on all spirits manufactured after the 1st day of January, and rest there, and then let the revenue come as fast as the whisky shall be manufactured. But if this is all the measure we are to have for this session, and if the Committee on Finance will tell us that this is all they anticipate, I am very willing to go for this: It will increase the revenue fifty cents on every gallon manufactured between the 1st day of January and the 1st day of February. We shall get $1 50 at any rate, but if this bill passes it will add fifty cents on every gallon.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course there can be no understanding between the two Houses on a question of this kind, nor would it be in order for me to state the opinions of members of the House of Representatives on this subject; but I can state what I believe from the legislation of Congress, and perhaps what I believe also from conversations with various members of the other House and also of this body, that this bill was intended in the House of Representatives as a kind of compromise or settlement between the various opinions on this subject. There is a feeling in the House that there ought to be a tax on spirits on hand. That has been a controverted point here in the Senate for a long time. Many of those who were friendly to the proposition to tax the stock on hand were satisfied with this proposition, and hoped that during the month of January the increased duty of fifty cents would furnish us some additional revenue at least, and would compensate for what was lost by the failure to tax spirits on hand. As a matter of course there can be no understanding about it. Any member of the House, or any member of the Senate, may introduce a proposition to tax spirits on hand. My impression is that if this bill passes it will be the end of the whisky question.

Mr. POMEROY. That was all I wanted to know.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to have the bill read.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. McDUGALL. It strikes me that there is an injustice in this change, because our legislation in that respect is somewhat in the nature of a contract with the people who are engaged in this business. I am not disposed to discuss the matter, but I know it is radically wrong.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not anything to say in regard to the merits of the measure proposed, but I trust that this is the last bill we shall be called upon to give our sanction to that contains such phraseology as is embodied in this. This bill proposes to strike out the word "February" wherever it occurs in a certain act of Congress passed twelve months ago, and to substitute the word "January." What would be thought of a bill to strike out the word "February" in an act passed twenty years ago, and which had been standing on our statute-book that length of time, and to substitute the word "July?" Why, sir, it is the most inartificial manner of drawing a bill, and would not be creditable to any Legislature.

I have not anything to say about the merits of the proposition. I am prepared to vote for it, and am going to vote for the bill as it stands, unless it be amended; but this is a kind of phraseology that ought not to be indulged in.

Mr. McDUGALL. I object to this bill, not for its phraseology but for its substance. When the bill of the last session was passed, we gave notice to the people who engaged in this kind of enterprise that we had made certain assessments and certain rules whereby their commerce might be governed. Now, by active legislation we propose to anticipate their business by a month, which will interfere, I suppose, very materially with the business of the men engaged in that department of commerce. It is unjust, and its rectitude cannot be maintained by any force of argument. I therefore object to it, and shall not vote for it even if it does add some dollars to the Treasury.

Mr. FARWELL. I propose to vote for this bill as the best thing we can get at the present time, although I regret exceedingly, and I believe the people of the country regret exceedingly, the legislation upon this subject at the last session. The effect of that legislation, in exempting from taxation the amount of spirits on hand, has taken from the Treasury of the nation sufficient to pay every soldier now in the field all that is due him. And who has it given it to? It has given it to the speculators in whisky; and, ordinarily, they are not the best class of citizens. What injustice, I would ask, would be done these men by taxing the stock of whisky on hand? If the Government established an additional tax, and the manufacturers had to pay it, would not the amount of the tax be at once added to the cost of production and be added to the price of the article? And, sir, it has been added. The men who held these large stocks of whisky have added the prospective tax that was to go upon it, and have sold it with this addition, and made the profits that should have gone into the Treasury.

But, sir, as this bill goes into operation at the earliest possible day, only a week hence, I think it is the best thing, under the circumstances, that can be had, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think, with the Senator from California, that the principle of this bill is altogether wrong. I do not rise to maintain that by anything of argument, but to say that the criticism made by the Senator from Iowa is, I think, entitled to such weight that we ought to amend the bill. There is no difficulty in amending it. The whole object of the bill is to impose the tax of two dollars upon domestic spirits on the 1st of January instead of the 1st of February, as it stands under the act. We may do that by saying that the "1st of February" in a certain section of the original act is to be stricken out and the "1st of January" substituted. If it is agreeable to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, I will ask that the bill be laid on the table for a moment to see if we cannot amend it so as to avoid that defect. It can be done in a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. McDUGALL. Why not amend it so as to make the tax on the 1st of February two dollars?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the present law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the bill be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) It will lie on the table for the present.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of requiring all residents of the District of Columbia to take and file with the provost marshal of said District an oath of allegiance or fidelity to the Government of the United States similar to the oath required by law of Members and Senators in Congress and other officers of the Government; and also the expediency and propriety of prohibiting all persons from doing business in said District or with the several Departments of the Government who have not or may not take and file such oath; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to thank the Senator from Iowa for introducing this proposition, and at the same time to call the attention of the Senate to a bill which is on their Calendar, which I had the honor of introducing at the last session, but which, for some unaccountable reason unknown to me, has been reported upon adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary, requiring that same oath to be taken by the practitioners in the courts of the United States. I am told that there are lawyers in the city of Washington who decline to practice in the courts here because they are unwilling to take the oath which you, sir, have taken, and which the Chief Justice of the United States only the other day took before he entered upon his functions; and yet these same lawyers flaunt in the Supreme Court of the United States. That ought to be stopped; and I give notice therefore that, carrying out the spirit of the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, I shall ask the attention of the Senate as soon as possible to that bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is not my intention to discuss at any length this resolution, but simply to ask for the yeas and nays on its adoption. I would take that oath myself very willingly, although I believe, as far as relates to members of Congress, it is wholly unconstitutional. I do not object to it, as far as it could relate to myself, because of anything other than its unconstitutionality contained in it; but I regard it, if it should pass, as one of those acts of unnecessary oppression on the part of the Government which in times like these ought to be avoided. Is there any evidence before this Senate that the old inhabitants of this city, those of them who are living here, have given any trouble to this Government, or even to this Administration? They are without a voice in the Government, and they have been sitting quietly at home, doing naught, as appears from any evidence, that is wrong toward this Government; and shall not this Administration and its supporters just coming into power again, flushed with victory, and dreaming perhaps of the perpetuation of their power for years to come, be satisfied with present victory over political opponents, but shall they pursue them into the quiet walks of life, seek out the high-toned, honorable men and women of this city, and compel them to subscribe to any form of oath that may be dictated by a member of this Senate, or by a supporter of this Administration, or by anybody else? When a man is quietly pursuing his business, will you not let him rest in peace if he is doing naught against you, or will you hunt him down? Will you try to drive him out from the community?

Sir, I do not say that the honorable Senator who introduced this resolution meant it as an act of oppression, but it is such in its nature and in its character, and it ought not to be tolerated by this Senate. The honorable Senator must have a very high appreciation of the enemies of this Government, whom he regards as traitors, if he supposes that a simple oath would bind them. Does the honorable Senator think that the man who would be guilty of treason would be bound by an oath? What is the object, therefore, of introducing it?

Sir, when I first came to this city six years ago, the population in it was very different from what it is now. Gentlemen engaged here in business, it may be, are envious of their situation by persons from distant States and distant sections of the country, who think they are living prosperously, and who suppose that by their removal from business their own private stores will be increased. If the object be, therefore, to give to the supporters of this Administration all the business of this city, if it be to drive out everybody from this city who will not tamely and quietly submit to take any and every oath which may be presented them—if that be the object, I submit that the Senator ought to reflect at least before he attempts to force the passage of such a measure through this body.

Sir, I will not discuss the question further. Regarding it simply as an act of oppression, believing that no possible good, but only evil, can result from it, I shall content myself with simply objecting to its passage, and calling for the yeas and nays upon it, in order that I may record my vote in opposition to it.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator from Delaware misapprehends the purport of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator allow the Chair to ascertain whether the call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution is seconded?

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator from Delaware will withdraw that on reflection. This is merely a resolution instructing the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the expediency and propriety of such a measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I have but one observation to make in addition to the remark made to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] that this is a resolution instructing the committee to make an inquiry on this subject. It is barely possible that the committee might report adversely to any legislation. I am frank to state, however, that I think some such legislation is necessary, and ought to be had. I did not suppose a resolution of this kind would implicate any member of this body. It is not intended to require opponents of the Administration per se to take an oath of fidelity to the Administration as a political organization, but an oath of fidelity to the Government itself during the existence of a gigantic rebellion. I am inclined to think that a casual listener to the speech of the Senator would suppose that he regarded himself as implicated in the inquiry; that, because he opposed some of the political measures of the Administration, therefore he must be considered as an opponent of the Government itself, and therefore is in alliance or in sympathy with the rebels. He argues as if he supposed all opponents of the Administration were rebels. I apprehend that no Senator on this floor would maintain for a moment that an alien enemy has a right to remain here and do business in the capital of the nation in time of war, and that the Government would have no right to make use of the necessary means to expel him. And if so, why may not the Government expel from the capital a domestic enemy during the existence of a great armed rebellion? The right to do so, in my opinion, is clear. The only question is one of expediency and propriety. And this question I propose to refer to a standing committee of this body.

While, then, I maintain that in my opinion some such legislation may be necessary, and I desire the inquiry to be made by one of the standing committees of this body, I do not think it can be properly denominated a measure of persecution against political opponents of the party in power; and I think the Senator does himself and his political friends gross injustice in throwing out such an intimation. He surely does not desire the mass of the people of this country to understand that he and his political associates are opponents of the Government of the United States and are in sympathy and alliance with the rebels. And yet he argues as if in his judgment opposition to the rebels was in some way detrimental to the Democratic party. But if that is not what he means his whole speech is without pertinence.

I think this inquiry would be well enough, and in my opinion such legislation would be proper. The committee may differ with me in opinion; and if the committee should agree with me in opinion, a majority of the Senate might differ with me. I think that no evil at least can grow out of the inquiry, and I therefore desire the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall make no reference to the personal allusions of the honorable Senator to myself. If he really is pained at the idea that by any remarks I have made public suspicion, or even private suspicion, may be aroused that I am not true to the Government of the United States, and am in sympathy with those whom he styles rebels, let me tell him that his sympathy is wasted. I have seen enough since the commencement of these troubles to care but very little what either private individuals or masses of individuals think of my political course or my political principles. I do not seek for instructions in patriotism or in duty either from individual men or from large masses of men. Though God Almighty has given me but a feeble intellect, and but little light to discover the path of truth, such as He has given me governs me, and not the intellect of others, or the opinions of others, however much I may respect the opinions of my fellow-men.

Sir, those who choose to regard me and my political associates as in sympathy with rebellion are welcome to the indulgence of their very charitable opinion. I shall do naught, as a member of this body or in private life, to remove any such suspicion from their minds. I know very well the distinction between the Government of the United States and the Administration at the present time. I know they are asunder as far as the polls; that they approach each other no nearer than heaven and earth approach each other; but I know the doctrine attempted to be inculcated at the present day by a large number of people in this country and by a very influential press, and that is, that the Government is the Administration, and the Administration is the Government.

I see no objection on all proper occasions to any man and every man in the United States taking an oath to support the Government of the United States and the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, the honorable Senator does not live in the section that some of us do. He has not seen the progress that these measures have made. He has not heard it announced, perhaps, as we have, that it is traitorous to oppose the actions of the Administration in times like these. He has not heard voters at the polls questioned in reference to their fidelity to an Administration, not their fidelity to a Government or to a Constitution. Sir, had the honorable Senator lived in the section from which I come, had he lived in what was once the glorious and gallant State of Maryland—if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] will pardon me—which is now the province of Maryland, under the acts of this Administration, he would have seen how the very inception of such measures as this worked injury, and how in their progress they work harder.

But, sir, I do not intend to be provoked (if I may use that term) into any lengthy discussion on this question. I believe the proposition is wrong in principle, unprecedented in practice, can be attended with no possible good, and will be oppressive in its operation.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, during the period of the present lamentable war there has been no time when the people of the District of Columbia have made any demonstration against the Government or the Administration. That is a simple fact bound to be admitted. What occasion there can be for this special legislation, I cannot comprehend. That the people of the District of Columbia, a people who are to a certain extent ignored in our Government, and who have no right of suffrage in the establishment of the Federal Government, should be particularly proscribed or called upon specially to take special oaths, man by man, is something which I do not understand. I cannot understand it, particularly at this time, when if there ever was a time for it the policy of conciliation should be the policy of the Government. We have triumphed in arms; jubilate has been said from north to south, from east to west throughout all the land for what we have accomplished; and why require this particular thing of the people of this District? what is the occasion which has demanded it? I would think it strange if I were demanded to go through that same process, but to demand it of the people of the District of Columbia to go through the whole population and require them to do this thing in order that they may maintain the right of citizenship in this District is a strange proposition to me. I should like to know from some one the good reason for it.

We have been here, most of us, during the whole period of this war. We have seen no disturbance here. We have heard of men going to the Capitol prison, &c., but we have seen no disturbance, we have seen nothing that required any particular legislation to compel the people of the District of Columbia, who are deprived of a portion of the rights of American citizens by virtue of their residence, to do things which are not required of the other citizens of the Republic. I look upon it, I cannot otherwise than look upon it, as an oppressive and wrongful act. Of course this is only a resolution of inquiry, but all these things tend to agitation. I say that to-day our policy is or should be a policy of conciliation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Iowa yesterday submitted this resolution I felt it to be my duty to object to its consideration at that time. I do not intend now to enter into this debate at any length, but I wish to say that the suggestion, in my judgment, which he has made that this was but an inquiry is not a sufficient argument to support his resolution unless in addition to that he is able to state to the Senate that the true interests of the Government require the people of this District to be placed in an attitude not occupied by the rest of the citizens of the United States. Does the Senator say that? He has not said it so far as I have heard his argument.

When this war broke out I have no doubt that there were many citizens of the District of Columbia who sympathized with the southern movement; but the proceedings of the Administration, not then supported by law, in many instances, have sent many of these people to the prisons—some have been sent across the lines—and now, within the last year, is the Senator able to say that the people of the District of Columbia are less true to the Government in the discharge of all their obligations than the citizens of any other portion of the country? I take it, sir, that although this is a mere inquiry, the adoption of the resolution casts a suspicion upon the fidelity of the people of this District to their obligations to the Government. If the Senator from Iowa proposed a resolution instructing one of the committees to inquire into the propriety of requiring the citizens of Indiana to take such an oath as is not required of the rest of the people of the country, would it not be my duty, and the duty of my colleague, if that proposition were not supported by a strong array of facts to justify it, to protest against an imputation by the Senate against the fidelity of the people of that State to their Government? If, then, as the representative of that State, such would be my duty, is it not the duty of the Senators who do not believe that the people of the District of Columbia are untrue in their obligation to the Government to protest, as their representatives? They have no special representative on this floor; there is no Senator here whose duty it is specially to stand up for their honor. I think it is the duty, then, of every Senator to see that no unjust imputation is made against them.

I know nothing in the history of this District of Columbia, or in the conduct of the people in this District for the last year, that justifies the resolution which the Senator from Iowa has proposed to the Senate. When we instruct a committee to inquire into a thing of that sort, the presumption arises that there is some ground for that inquiry. What is the ground? Men have been arrested here; they have been sent to prison. They have been arrested in the Senator's own State; they have been charged with disloyalty there, and have been sent to the prisons; but is that arbitrary conduct on the part of the Administration a reason why the Senate should place a brand of suspicion on a part of the people of this country?

As I suggested yesterday, I am opposed to a resolution that contemplates the increase of oaths in this country. Why does the Senator intimate by his resolution that it is necessary to pass a law to require the people to take an oath of this sort? Have these oaths been required of the people without authority of law all over the country? It has been done in Indiana, in Kentucky, and, I venture to say, in the Senator's own State, without authority of law. Then does the Senator by this inquiry intend to be understood as saying that the Administration has pursued a course not authorized by law in this respect? Very many men, very many honest men, very many true citizens have been required to subscribe oaths to protect their persons and their property. The Senator by this resolution intimates that that is all wrong and illegal. I grant that it is. It is a shame that without authority of law any man has been required to take an oath which is not required of the rest of the people.

But, sir, in my judgment it does not promote the fidelity of the people to the institutions of the country to require an oath like this. It tends to promote and encourage perjury. Swearing men upon every trivial occasion does not promote the cause of truth, in my judgment, and I think one of the evils of the country is that we require men to swear upon almost every occasion, when entering into the most unimportant office and discharging the most trivial duties. I find my views upon that particular point so well expressed by one of the ablest writers in our language that I will read from "Buckle's History of Civilization in England" a short extract.

Mr. SUMNER. Which volume?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The first volume, page 259.

"It is this suspicion as to the motives of others which has given rise to oaths of every kind and in every direction. In England, even the boy at college is forced to swear about matters which he cannot understand, and which far wiser minds are unable to master. If he afterwards goes into Parliament, he must again swear about his religion."

As we Senators are required to swear that we are true to our country.

"And at nearly every stage of political life he must take fresh oaths, the solemnity of which is often strangely contrasted with the trivial functions to which they are the prelude. A solemn adjuration of the Deity being thus made at every turn, it has happened, as might have been expected, that oaths, regarded as a matter of course, have at length degenerated into a matter of form. What is lightly taken is easily broken. And the best observers of English society—observers, too, whose characters are very different, and who hold the most opposite opinions—are all agreed on this, that the perjury habitually practiced in England, and of which Government is the immediate creator, is so general that it has become a source of national corruption, has diminished the value of human testimony, and shaken the confidence which men naturally place in the word of their fellow-creatures."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana to allow the bill which I reported this morning to be acted on now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will finish what I have to say in a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) It is the duty of the Chair at this time to announce that the unfinished business of yesterday is the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will indulge me for three minutes I will conclude all I desire to say on this question.

Mr. WILSON. Let the special order be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done; and the Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What does the Senator from Iowa wish to reach by his proposition, the opinions or the conduct of men? If he wishes to strike at the conduct of men, that is properly reached through the courts. If men in the District of Columbia have been guilty of such acts as the law condemns, the courts in the District of Columbia are open; they can be tried and convicted. If the Senator wishes to reach the opinions, the convictions of citizens, I protest against a policy which has proved prejudicial and hurtful to Government wherever it has been adopted. You cannot correct the opinions of men by requiring them to take oaths. It is one of the evils that England for the last twenty years has been abandoning, and I hope that our own country will not adopt a policy which experience has shown that the older Governments of the world ought to abandon and are abandoning.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow us to dispose of the important matter which was temporarily laid aside, that must be acted on now if at all.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall not occupy more than a few moments; but the Senator from Indiana addressed himself so directly and personally to me that I ought to respond.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill to which I refer will not take long.

Mr. HARLAN. When I conclude I shall have no objection to laying this resolution aside for the purpose of taking up that bill.

The Senator from Indiana addressed himself very directly, and I thought somewhat personally, to me. He propounded a number of inquiries, one of which was whether I was disposed to cast suspicion on the people of the District of Columbia as to their loyalty. I do not think that this is a legitimate logical conclusion to be drawn from the adoption of the resolution, no more than it would have been from the passage of the law requiring members of Congress to take a similar oath. I did not infer from the passage of that law that any person voting for it supposed that a majority of the members of this body, or any of them, were unfaithful to the Government; but it was supposed to be barely possible that some one or more persons might present themselves here and claim seats who had been engaged in this rebellion, and for the purpose of ferreting out the few possible cases the general rule was adopted requiring all to take the prescribed oath.

Now, sir, this is not unusual. It is not unusual for communities to institute a search of every house in a town or a city where a burglary or theft may have been committed, not that it is supposed that the majority of the people of the town or city are thieves or burglars, but because it is known that the law has been violated, and that goods have been stolen and hidden away, and that there is probably a thief in the community, and that the stolen goods are concealed, and for the purpose of ferreting out the thief and ascertaining where the goods are, all the citizens submit to a search, and do it voluntarily. No man permitting his house to be searched supposes he will be regarded as in complicity with the thieves. The general search is made for the purpose of protecting each one from the consequences of unjust suspicion. If the search was made of the house of the suspected party alone, it would wound his feelings, and probably ruin his character for all time to come; and for the purpose of preserving him from the consequences of a possible unjust suspicion, the general search is made. And so I apprehend we may justify the passage of a law requiring every member of Congress to take an oath of fidelity to the Government, not because it is supposed that a majority of them, or any considerable number of them, lack fidelity, but because it is believed that some may possibly present themselves who are unworthy of trust; and to avoid the consequences of unjust suspicion on any one member, the general rule is adopted requiring all to take the oath. Now, sir, the proposition that I make, if adopted by Congress, will screen each individual from unjust suspicion, and yet afford means of detecting the guilty parties, whose continuance in our midst may enable them to afford assistance to the public enemy.

The Senator desired me to state whether I knew of any facts that would justify the passage of any such law as the resolution contemplates. I am amazed that any one could ask such a question as that who has lived in this District for a single month. We all know that there are people living in this District who are not only in sympathy with the rebellion, but who embrace every available opportunity to aid the rebels in arms against their Government, who carry goods through the lines on every occasion that they can make available, and who send the proceeds of their trades and of their professions to their sons, and brothers, and husbands in the rebel army, so that we are, in harboring them in our midst, indirectly supporting the rebellion. In my opinion, we have a right to drive them from this community.

But the Senator inquired whether I would propose any such law for Indiana. There is a marked difference between the political condition of this District and that of a State. Congress has "exclusive jurisdiction" over this District, has a right to prescribe all its laws. It has not the right thus to legislate for a sovereign State. And hence the distinction is clear between the political condition of the people of a State and the political condition of the people of this District. He said that the people of the District had no representatives in this body. Sir, we are all the representatives of this District, and are bound by our oaths to legislate in good faith for their welfare; and in my opinion every loyal citizen of this District would thank Congress for the adoption of any measure calculated to drive from their midst aiders and abettors of the rebellion. In my opinion this resolution ought to pass; I think a law on this subject ought to be enacted, but I am content to leave that question with the committee appointed to take the immediate oversight of the interests of the District.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a question, if he will be kind enough to answer it. Suppose his resolution should be passed and an inhabitant of this District should refuse to take the prescribed oath, what does he propose to do in such a case as that?

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator from Delaware misapprehends the whole purport of the resolution. It is a resolution of instruction, instructing the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the propriety and expediency of such a law, and that is the whole of it. If they should report a bill on the subject, and the question should then pertinently arise which has been propounded by the Senator, I should take great pleasure in attempting to answer it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The experience of Senators in this body shows that when an inquiry of this character is directed, the committees generally report in accordance with the suggestions contained in the resolutions directing the inquiry. The Senator suggests that this is only a simple inquiry, and that no harm can result from it. For myself, believing that a report of the character that he wishes made will be made, and as he himself says it is barely possible the committee will not report favorably, I have felt it my duty to oppose even the inquiry.

Now, sir, I shall be justified in opposing it here on its passage, because the committee cannot report a bill upon this subject that will not be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. I know that it is an able committee, and I know that it can do on this subject whatever any other committee of this body or any other body can do; but is there a propriety in making an inquiry whether a thing should not be done, which, if done, would be violative of the Constitution of the United States? Why do I say that? If the committee report a bill saying that an oath of this character shall be administered to every inhabitant of this District, and to every person doing business in this District, they must provide some mode of compelling the party to take it in case of refusal. Now, what is the Constitution of the United States, and wherein would a bill with any penalty, a penalty, for instance, of removal from the District in case of non-compliance with it, be violative of the Constitution? In this respect the Constitution provides that:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." * * * "nor shall he be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Now, I apprehend it will be very difficult for the District Committee to frame a law allowing a trial by jury for the purpose of compelling a person to take the oath. I presume the punishment would be more summary than such as could be administered by a court upon conviction by a jury. It might be exportation from the District, and that would be depriving a person of his liberty without due process of law. It might be taking away his property, and clearly that would be a violation of the Constitution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collier, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wickliffe, and Wiley—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Powell, Richardson, and Saulsbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Canine, Chandler, Doolittle, Harding, Harris, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Rainey, Riddle, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—15.

So the resolution was agreed to.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that he had yesterday approved and signed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 329) for the relief of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 350) to authorize the purchase or construction of revenue cutters on the lakes;

A bill (S. No. 352) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 83) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John A. Winslow, United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command on board the United States steamer Kearsarge, in the conflict with the piratical craft the Alabama; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 84) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, United States Navy, and to the officers and men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous achievement in destroying the rebel steamer Albemarle.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. WILSON. I now call for the regular order of the day.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator waive his call for a moment, to enable us take up the bill from the House of Representatives imposing the two-dollar tax on whisky? If it is to be passed it is important that it should be passed to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose I shall have to give way to that bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only ask that the Senator give way to that as it was laid aside on my motion. I have now prepared an amendment to carry out the suggestion which I made. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That the tax of two dollars on spirits imposed by the fifty-fifth section of the act "to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, be levied, collected, and paid on and after the 1st day of January, 1865, instead of the 1st day of February in said year as provided by said original act.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an amendment simply of phraseology. I like the language used by the Senator from Maryland better than the language sent to us from the other House; but I submit to him whether it is worth while to raise a question of phraseology on a bill that must be acted upon to-day or to-morrow. I think if a majority of the Senate is in favor of the substance of the bill we had better pass it in the language used by the House of Representatives. I have no objection to the amendment except that it tends to delay and possibly produce the defeat of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Personally, as a member of this body, without meaning to reflect at all on the House of Representatives or any member of it, I should be very unwilling to vote for the bill in the form in which it comes from that House. We are responsible for the phraseology of our legislation as well as that House itself. If, as I understand was the fact, the House was very decided in opinion that the tax should be levied on the 1st of January instead of the 1st of February, it will at once adopt the amendment if the bill be returned with the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit again to the Senate whether we had not better, as it is merely a question of phraseology, only a choice of words, take the substance of the proposition, if we are in favor of it, and not amend it.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the object of this bill to be in substance to impose in January the maximum tax on whisky, which by the present law will not be subject to the additional tax until the month of February; in other words, to impose the increased tax a month previous to the time proposed by the law that was passed at the last session. I am opposed to the passage of this bill, and I am opposed to this mode of legislation, upon what I deem to be two very substantial considerations. The first is stability in legislation; the second, good faith to the people in the legislation of Congress.

The people who were interested in the whisky trade have made themselves familiar with this provision of the law; they have adapted their contracts and their business to it; and you cannot change the law now by imposing the tax in February instead of January, thus giving it practical operation a month sooner than by the law as passed it was to go into operation, without seriously deranging the business of some men, and probably a great many of them, and producing considerable loss to them. All the dealers in this article—and they are very numerous, and their transactions are very large and valuable to themselves and to the country generally, but especially to themselves—have made their contracts and their arrangements with a view to the fact that this increased tax was to take effect in February. I think that the consideration of stability in legislation ought to induce Congress to forego the amount of increased revenue that might be obtained by giving this clause in the law a month's earlier operation.

The other principle to which I referred is the question of good faith on the part of the Government to the people in its legislation. No man who has any information or intelligence in relation to this subject can suppose that this proposed change in the law can take effect without producing very serious loss to many individuals. If Congress in passing the original law had established the date of January, no man would have had the right to complain; every man would have been duly notified of the law some months before it went into operation, and he would have had time to conform his contracts and his interests to the law and to the time fixed by Congress for its taking effect. But when Congress has passed the law in this form, pledged its faith to one date, and has thus induced traders and dealers in this great article to make their contracts and arrangements with a view to that date, it seems to me that it would not be good faith, on the contrary it would be bad faith, in Congress now to change the law and subject these men to the loss that must be inevitable upon the change.

Gentlemen in the Senate speak as though all the property in the country belonged to the Government, and the Government had the sovereign right to dispose of all the property of the people, so far, at least, as regards imposing taxes upon it, according to its sovereign will and pleasure. Now, sir, my principle is that the property of the people of the United States belongs to the people themselves, and not to the Government, and it is their option, their will, that votes any of this property in the form of taxes or in any other form whatever to the Government. The Government is not the master, it is the agent, it is the servant, and its action and its laws ought to be in obedience to the will and to the interests of the people, and especially ought to be in obedience to the rule of good faith with the people.

I hope that this measure will not pass either in the form of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland or in the form of the bill as reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I trust that stability in legislation and good faith to the people will be adhered to in relation to this matter and all other matters of law and legislation by Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. I think with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that perhaps the phraseology offered as a substitute by the Senator from Maryland is the best; but under the circumstances of the pending adjournment of Congress and the necessity for passing the bill, I hope that it will not be adopted now, but that the phraseology of the bill will be adhered to.

The amendment was rejected, there being, on a division—ayes 9, noes 19.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee whether this is to be the last legislation on the subject of the whisky tax for this session, so far as he knows the purpose of his committee and of the two Houses. It is exceedingly prejudicial to any interest of this magnitude to have it legislated upon so frequently. I see that it is here taken up as a special matter; it does not come in the regular revenue bill. If this is to be the tax, no more and no less, permanently for the future, it is well that the country should know it; but if it is the purpose of the committee to bring in a bill proposing an increased tax at some future day of the session, it had better be done now. The course pursued in regard to this article has facilitated speculation in the country and has not brought that revenue which another policy, in my judgment, would have produced. I think it is to the interest of the people, as well as of the Government, that we should know whether this is to be all the legislation on the subject of whisky taxation for the session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I answered the inquiry when the Senator from Indiana was not present, when it was put to me by the gentleman who now occupies the chair, [Mr. POMEROY,] but I have no objection to answer it again. I would not have introduced any bill on the subject of the tax on whisky, but would have left it to the law of last year, if I had my own way, and I will reply now to the Senator from Maine. He was not present when this subject was considered at the last session, and I may perhaps say that if it had not been for his distinguished predecessor the result might have been different. I was then, as I am now, in favor of taxing whisky on hand; I think we lost a very large source of revenue in delaying the tax; but that has passed by. This bill comes to us from the House of Representatives in its present form. I cannot state what is the understanding of that House, but I presume, from what I hear and what I see in the newspapers, that this bill was rather the result of a compromise of the various conflicting interests. It was first introduced in the form of a bill taxing the stock on hand, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report back that bill. The Committee of Ways and Means reported back this bill with a second section containing a tax upon the stock on hand; and the first section of the reported bill, which is the bill now before us, was finally adopted by the other House, perhaps not as a compromise altogether, but as a kind of settlement of the matter. This is what I gather from the debates of Congress. As a matter of course any Senator or any member of the other House may introduce the question at any time, and invoke the action of the committees of the two Houses and force us to consider it. I cannot, therefore, say that this is a final settlement. I can only say for myself that I hope it is a final settlement, and that I, certainly, as an individual Senator, will not introduce the subject again.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This bill comes before the Senate without any very strong endorsement by the chairman of the committee who brings it to our notice, and I think there was a great deal of force in what was said by the Senator from Kentucky, and I propose to state in a very few words why I shall vote against it.

As I understand the object of the bill, it is to obtain an increased revenue by imposing fifty cents additional tax upon whisky which shall be manufactured during the next month. I was not at all satisfied with the legislation on this subject at the last session of Congress. We have lost the entire revenue which might have been derived from whisky during the last six months, as I understand. I know that in the State of Illinois, where a great deal of whisky had been manufactured previously, the distilleries have all stopped. If any of them are in operation now I am not aware of it. Certainly they are not in operation to any very considerable extent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to my colleague, having investigated that matter, that there are three, out of hundreds that have been running.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Running to their full capacity?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all. I will state, if my colleague will permit me, that they are awaiting the action of Congress. Any change of the law is detrimental to the revenue which the Government will derive from that source.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not different from what I had supposed. I was not aware, however, that there were even three distilleries in operation in the State of Illinois, but it seems that those are not running to their full capacity. Now, sir, having adopted the legislation which we did at the last session of Congress, I think it would be very injudicious and prejudicial to interfere with it at this time in the mode proposed. It has been stated in the Senate that our legislation at the last session led to speculation in this article of whisky. It is known to every one that the distilleries were running to their fullest capacity for some time previous to the legislation of Congress, in anticipation of that legislation; and vast fortunes are understood to have been made out of whisky by speculators. If you now pass this bill, what will be the effect? It will add the amount of the tax, or very nearly that, to the value of the whisky on hand. No considerable amount of whisky will be manufactured between now and February, I apprehend. The Senator from Ohio shakes his head. Experience ought to teach us about that. If it will be manufactured between now and February, why has it not been manufactured the last month, and the month before that? Why have all the distilleries in the country stopped? Because the quantity on hand was sufficient to supply the demand for such a length of time that the manufacturers could not afford to manufacture it, so as to compete with those who held it on hand, and hold the manufactured article till the quantity on hand should be exhausted so that they could demand for it a price that would justify their paying the tax. November and December are as good months as any in which to manufacture whisky. I think there is no danger of any considerable quantity of whisky being manufactured between now and February for the purpose of escaping the additional tax. Whisky has been worth very little more than the tax that is now laid upon it for the last three months. It has run up within a few days in anticipation of this very legislation. The men who have the whisky on hand want the tax increased on that which is to be manufactured hereafter. They would be willing to have a tax of five dollars a gallon imposed. They have made fortunes already, and if you put a tax of five dollars per gallon on all that shall be manufactured after to-morrow, they will make additional fortunes on what they now have, and none will be manufactured until the whisky on hand is exhausted.

Sir, I think you will gain but little, in fact nothing, to your revenues by the passage of this bill, while you adopt an unstable mode of legislation and swell the fortunes of speculators who have dealt in this article and have large quantities of it on hand, for they are to be benefited by the passage of this law rather than your revenue.

For these reasons, without going any length into the subject, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Illinois correctly says that the proposition is not pressed very strongly by the Committee on Finance, because they were divided on the question. All the considerations that he has now presented were considered by us, and I think I can reply at least to some of the suggestions made by the Senator from Illinois, perhaps satisfactorily to him.

We saw that the effect of this legislation would be to add to the price of the article on hand, and thus add to the profits of the holders of whisky on hand. Our previous legislation had done that, and this was an argument, certainly, which would tend to prevent us from doing anything for their special benefit. But, on the other hand, we became convinced by examination that if this bill was not passed, a very large amount of whisky would be manufactured in the month of January, the information being very clear that nearly all the distillers in the United States were prepared to run and would commence running as soon as it was certain that Congress would not put a tax upon the stock on hand. We are informed, and I have no doubt it is true, that what has kept the price of whisky below the natural standard is the fact that holders were afraid that Congress at the present session would review its action of the last session, and put a tax upon spirits on hand; and that fear has operated to keep down the price of spirits. I have no doubt that but for that fear the price of spirits would have advanced above two dollars a gallon. The only reason and the strong reason why I am in favor of this proposition is that if it is not passed at once, a very large amount of whisky will be manufactured between now and the 1st of February; from ten to twenty million gallons may be manufactured by the distilleries in the country; they will be run night and day, and they will supply the market for a long time, paying but a dollar and a half revenue to the Government, and then on the 1st of February, when the two-dollar tax goes into operation according to the present law, the business will stop and no more will be manufactured for several months afterwards. It is true that during the month of January, under the operation of the present law, the Government will get a very large revenue. If ten million gallons should be manufactured in January the Government would derive $15,000,000 revenue from the article during that month; but if then the revenue should be entirely cut off for some time to come, we should lose a great deal more than we should gain by continuing the duty at a dollar and a half. On the whole the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I may say all the officers of the revenue, were satisfied that it would be more for the interest of the Government at once to commence to lay the tax of two dollars on the 1st of January, and then consider the matter settled, so that all persons may arrange their trade and business on that basis, and adapt themselves to a fixed tax of two dollars from the 1st of January. As I said before, there are considerations which make me hesitate somewhat, but that was the result of my deliberate judgment after mature reflection. If, however, a majority of the Senate shall come to a different conclusion, I shall not complain.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Font, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wiley—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Tamm, and Van Winkle—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Clarke, Doolittle, Harding, Harris, Hicks, Howe, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—14.

So the bill was passed.

WEARING OF UNIFORM.

Mr. McDOUGALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and by unanimous consent agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be directed to inquire into the expediency of requiring by law that all officers not on leave of absence be required to carry on their persons their uniform.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 366) to remit certain duties on clothing materials imported for the use of the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) in reference to paymasters' accounts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. DIXON. I now move to take up the bill (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

Mr. SUMNER. Will not that displace the bill of my colleague, which is the order of the day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The motion of the Senator from Connecticut is to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SUMNER. My colleague went a few moments ago to the House of Representatives with the understanding that I should be allowed to call up the joint resolution which was postponed yesterday from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which it is desired should be acted on to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of business is in the control of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. DIXON. If the bill to which I have referred be taken up, I shall offer an amendment which I think will obviate all objections to it; and it is a bill which ought to be acted on now if at all.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator had better let it come up after the public business to which I have referred.

Mr. DIXON. I beg the Senator's pardon; this is public business. I insist upon my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

Mr. DIXON. It was objected yesterday that this bill does not fix a definite price for gas, to be charged by this company, but refers to the price in other cities as the standard. I propose to amend the bill by fixing a maximum price forty cents per hundred feet, with a deduction of ten per cent. for the Government and five per cent. for private consumers, bearing the price of $3 80 per thousand to private consumers and $3 60 to the Government as the maximum. My amendment is to strike out the following words in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth lines of the bill:

The average net or cash price which may be charged, as aforesaid, in the capitals of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, and that from the above price five per cent. shall be deducted on all gas furnished to the General Government.

And to insert in lieu of them the following:

Forty cents per hundred cubic feet, subject to a discount of ten per cent. on all bills for gas furnished to the Government, and five per cent. on all bills for gas furnished to other consumers, if paid at the office of the company within seven days from the rendition thereof.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not hear the honorable chairman of the District Committee, and I should like to know what is the increase upon the present rate that the company will be authorized to charge.

Mr. DIXON. The present rate on bills charged to the Government is $2 52 per thousand feet, and on bills to private consumers $2 70. The Senator can very readily see what the increase is. It is a little over one dollar per thousand. The bill makes the rate $3 60 per thousand feet for the Government and $3 80 for private consumers, which I believe is less than the average price charged in most cities in the Union where coal is cheaper than here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have here a letter from the president of the company, in which he says the present rate is $2 61. This will be an increase of about fifty per cent. This is a letter from Mr. Bartol—I do not know him, but he signs himself as president—in which he says the price of gas in 1860 was $3 50, and now the average is $2 61.

Mr. DIXON. That is after the deduction. It is $2 52 to the Government and $2 70 to private individuals; $2 61 is the average.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 56) which was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday.

Mr. HALE. That is the resolution giving notice to terminate the reciprocity treaty; as I understand.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I do not see why there should be hot haste in pushing that matter through to-day. I am opposed to it; I am decidedly opposed to it. I do not want to make any factious opposition to it, but I think it is hardly fair to go into so important a measure as that at this time. I wish to have it lie over. I understand if the notice is given there is nearly a year and a half before the treaty can be terminated.

Mr. SUMNER. A year from the 16th of March next.

Mr. HALE. Then there can be no harm done by letting this resolution lie over until the 1st of January. I desire to examine a little into the operations of the treaty. In my humble judgment this is a step that the Senate ought not to take, and particularly ought they not to take it under an excited state of feeling which exists now in consequence of what we conceive to be a great wrong inflicted on us by the authorities of some of those provinces that are particularly affected by this treaty. I know that when this treaty was negotiated, when the reciprocity principle was established, it was looked upon by the enlightened statesmen of this country and of England as an advance in the social progress of society, and as a step in the onward march which should unfree the shackles of commerce, and give greater liberty and greater progress to commercial intercourse between this country and those provinces. The objections which were suggested the other day by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] in regard to its operations upon the fisheries of New England exist at the present time only because of an accidental, temporary circumstance, to wit, the duty that we have felt compelled by the necessities of the Government at this time to impose on salt. That is a difficulty growing not out of the subject itself but out of the accidental state of things incident to and dependent upon the war which unhappily rages in this country.

Mr. President, there are very important privileges secured to the people of the United States, and especially to some of the eastern States, by this treaty, which it is proposed now rashly and inconsiderately, in my humble judgment, to throw away and to give up. Let me state one of them. In the first place, by this treaty the people of the United States, and all the United States, have the free use of the navigation of the St. Lawrence and of the canals which are made around Niagara falls, and by which the commerce of all the West may find free egress to and ingress from the ocean. That is one thing. The matter of the fisheries I alluded to yesterday, and there is another important privilege—

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest to the Senator that if the resolution shall be taken up, as he desires to speak, he can then speak upon it, because what he is saying now is rather pertinent to the main question than to the mere question of taking up.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire simply to suggest that the course proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts be taken, that the resolution be taken up, and that the Senator from New Hampshire address the Senate on the subject-matter, as he really is doing.

Mr. HALE. The difficulty is that I am not prepared at this time to do that. I am mentioning some of the considerations that would be pertinent, but I do not know what has been the operation of this treaty. It will appear from our published reports of Commerce and Navigation coming from the Secretary of the Treasury. I have not had time to examine them; I am not prepared at this time to discuss this matter, and I did not suppose it was to be taken up at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask if it is the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts to press a decision on the resolution now.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope to have a vote at once.

Mr. CONNESS. Why not?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection individually to taking it up and having it considered at this time; but I hope that the honorable chairman will not press it to a vote to-day. Perhaps it is desirable, and I individually think it is, that the subject should pass over until we meet again after the holidays. There is some uneasiness in the public mind already because of wrongs which we have suffered as it is supposed in consequence of the failure to do its whole duty on the part of the colonial authority in Canada. Whether that is justifiable or not, I am not prepared to say; but if we pass this resolution at this time terminating this treaty, it might be considered as rather an unfriendly act now—not that we have not a right to do it under the treaty. But I submit to my friend from Massachusetts whether it would not be better under all the circumstances to consider it more maturely than it can be considered as I suppose during the short period that the session of to-day will continue.

I have not the slightest objection, as I repeat, to taking up the question, and as I said in committee I say again, whether notice shall be given or not is a matter on which I am without a very settled opinion. My impression was when the treaty was entered into that it would be very beneficial to the country, and for a long time it was considered to operate advantageously to the country. I know that Mr. Webster was of opinion that it was a very advantageous arrangement. Whether it has ceased to be advantageous now, because of its intrinsic character, or whether it has become so because of subsequent legislation on the part of the colonial government, is a matter upon which I have no settled opinion.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. Webster died before the treaty was made.

Mr. SUMNER. Several years before.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that perfectly well; but he expressed his opinion about it long before; he talked about it to me over and over. I ought to have said that his statement was that such an arrangement would be very advantageous.

Mr. SUMNER. I would simply remark that I was instructed by the committee to ask for immediate action on this resolution, and there was a reason for it in this circumstance: that it had been long pending before both branches of Congress and before the committee itself, and that during the present session the other House has already acted, and the resolution reported by the committee is in the nature of a substitute for that of the House, and it was desirable that we should complete the action on the matter before the adjournment for the holidays. I hope there will be no question, but that we may proceed with it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was to strike out the original preamble and resolution, in the following words:

Whereas under the treaty made by the United States with Great Britain, proclamation of which was made by the President of the United States on the 11th of September, 1851, for the purpose of extending reciprocal trade between the British North American colonies and the United States, nearly all the articles which Canada has to sell are admitted into the United States free of duty, while heavy duties are now imposed upon many of those articles which the people of the United States have to sell, with the intention of excluding them from the Canadian markets; and whereas the President of the United States, in the first session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, caused to be submitted to the House of Representatives an official report setting forth the inequality and injustice existing in our present intercourse with Canada, subversive of the true intent of the treaty, owing to the subsequent legislation of Canada; and whereas by the fifth article of the treaty provision was made that it should remain in force for ten years from the date on which it should go into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties should give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of ten years, or at any time afterwards; and whereas by a further proclamation issued by the President of the United States, bearing date the 16th day of March, 1855, it was declared that the said treaty should go into effect and be observed on the part of the United States; and whereas it is desirable that friendly relations should be continued between the United States and the British North American provinces, and that commercial intercourse should be hereafter carried on between them upon principles reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory to both parties: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to give to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland the notice required by the fifth article of the said reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, for the termination of the same.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Whereas it is provided in the reciprocity treaty concluded at Washington, the 5th of June, 1854, between the United States of the one part, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of the other part, that this treaty "shall remain in force for ten years from the date at which it may come into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same;" and whereas it appears, by a proclamation of the President of the United States, bearing date 16th March, 1855, that the treaty came into operation on that day; and whereas, further, it is no longer for the interests of the United States to continue the same in force: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notice be given of the termination of the reciprocity treaty, according to the provision therein contained for the termination of the same; and the President of the United States is hereby charged with the communication of such notice to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I had originally intended, on the consideration of this proposition, to review the whole subject, and to exhibit at length the history of the reciprocity treaty, and the existing reasons for its termination. But after the debate of a few days ago, and considering the apparent unanimity in the Senate, I have felt unwilling to occupy the time by any protracted remarks. They are not needed.

The people of the United States have been uneasy under the reciprocity treaty for several years; I may almost say from its date. There was a feeling that it was more advantageous to Canada than to the United States; that, in short, it was unilateral. This feeling has of late ripened into conviction. At the same time the exigencies of the present war, requiring so large an expenditure, make it unreasonable for us to continue a treaty by which the revenues of the country unquestionably suffer. It is such considerations as these which have brought the public mind to its present position. The unamicable feelings manifested toward us by the people of Canada have had little influence on the question, unless, perhaps, they may have conspired to compel us to look at it in the light of reason rather than of sentiment.

The question of the fisheries is included in this treaty. But it is not doubted that before the termination of the treaty some arrangement, either by reciprocal legislation or by further negotiation, can be made on this matter so far as it may be needed.

The committee, after careful consideration at a full meeting, was unanimous in its report. And as the committee represents all parts of the country and all sentiments of the Senate, I have thought that perhaps there might be a similar unanimity among Senators. Therefore I forbear all further remarks, and ask for a vote.

Mr. FARWELL. I wish to say one word in reference to this subject. I regard the matter of the fishing interest as having very little to do with it anyway; but there are many reasons which might be adduced, I think conclusive reasons, why this reciprocity treaty should be terminated. I only propose to allude to one reason. Owing to the condition of our country, it has been found necessary to put very heavy taxes upon many articles which are brought from the provinces. Take, for example, the article of friction matches, upon which, by our internal revenue law, a duty of $1 44 a gross is imposed. The consumption is very great, and the manufacture would yield a very large revenue to the Government if they were made at home; and heretofore they have been largely manufactured in our country. By the reciprocity treaty, however, they can be made in the provinces and brought here duty free, and we cannot tax them. There are many other articles in the same position, if I am not mistaken, and the Government will suffer very much by the continuance of the present state of things, and the manufacturers of these articles will be driven from the business. In fact, I am informed that some manufacturers of matches and goods of that description have actually broken up their establishments in the States, and have moved into the provinces, and are there manufacturing and sending them to the States for sale. I believe there is no doubt about the opinion of the Senate, and therefore I do not regard it as necessary to enter into the discussion.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. HALE. Can this resolution be read a third time to-day without unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can. It has been read twice on a previous day. The third reading is the only reading to-day.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to complain of this course, nor to ask for any delay. I believe that this is an important step; it is a step that does not accord with my judgment; but if the Senate think it is of such importance that it should be passed at once, I shall simply content myself with voting against it.

Mr. SUMNER. I call for the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. HALE. I want to express my views upon it. I do not care about the Journal. I suppose there are not many people who read the Journal. This is the first time that I have ever known so important a measure as this pressed through the Senate under these circumstances; but I do not know that it is of any great consequence. I do not know whether the rule of the Senate with reference to these matters is the same in regard to a member just going out as one coming in, but I am ready to submit to the practice, whatever it is.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator knows the fact that I would not be guilty of discourtesy to him. I feel embarrassed by his suggestion, but in the responsibilities of public business which have been cast upon me I think I ought to press this resolution to a vote.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until the 6th day of January.

Mr. DAVIS. I concurred in this resolution being reported, and I expect to vote for its passage, but I think, in all courtesy, the Senator from New Hampshire ought to have time to examine the subject and to address the Senate upon it. I hope that the motion he makes will be allowed.

Mr. FOSTER. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations I was in favor of this resolution, and am in favor of its passage now; but whether it passes to-day or the 6th of January can make no difference to the public interests, in my belief. The Senator from New Hampshire requests an opportunity to address the Senate on the subject. I have never known such a request denied under like circumstances, even where, as it would seem, it sometimes made a very considerable difference to the public interests. To me it seems apparent that it will make none now. I, therefore, shall certainly vote to postpone it at his request.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was surprised, after the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, and the little experience I have had in the Senate, to see an attempt to press this resolution to a vote to-day. Like the Senator from Connecticut, I have never known an instance where a measure of this character, regarded as important in the country, has been brought to the notice of the Senate, and on a member rising in his place and stating before it was taken up that he wished to examine it, and that he asked but a reasonable time to make his examination and address the Senate upon it, his application was refused. I shall certainly vote to postpone the resolution until the Senator from New Hampshire can have a reasonable opportunity to address the Senate in reference to it. I would not vote to postpone it for any factious opposition; but where there is no such spirit displayed, but a reasonable request, as I conceive, and one that I never saw refused in the Senate, I shall vote for the postponement.

Mr. FOOT. I am in favor of the proposition before the Senate, and I represent a people who I think are unanimously in favor of terminating what they regard as an unequal and one-sided contract between this country and the provinces of Great Britain. But, sir, as I understand it, whether the joint resolution is passed to-day, or a fortnight hence, or a month hence, makes no sort of difference as to the period of time within which this contract can be terminated; and as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from New

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

Hampshire I must vote in favor of the postponement.

Mr. CONNESS. My recollection of the progress of this measure, and the period at which the request of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire was made, was that it was made upon the proposition to take up the resolution, and then it was that I took the liberty to suggest that it had better be taken up and then a determination arrived at as to whether a vote would be asked to-day or not. I then understood that the Senator, although with some little reluctance, to some extent withdrew his desire for a postponement; but before I had that understanding it had occurred to my own mind to move its postponement until the 5th of January, if he were in earnest in his desire to discuss the question. If he really does desire to discuss the question, of course no Senator would press the resolution to a vote, under the circumstances, against that request.

I say this not only for myself, but I think for the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I understood that to be the temper of the Senator from New Hampshire. We know that he is always ready to make a speech without preparation; and while he felt it to be his duty to make a speech on the subject before it should be determined and voted upon definitely, I rather took it by the Senator's manner (which is not difficult to be read, I think,) that he was half willing to withdraw it and allow a vote to be had. I think that there is no conflict on the simple proposition of allowing the Senator time if he desires it.

Mr. SUMNER. After the explanations that have been made, I am entirely in the hands of my friend from New Hampshire. I supposed that in the remarks he made on the question of taking up the joint resolution he had substantially stated his objection, and that he was not disposed to continue the discussion further. Had I supposed that he desired a further opportunity then, I should not have pressed to take up the proposition. Having had it taken up, I naturally desired to press it to a vote in obedience to the instructions that I had received from the committee which I represent on this floor. But I have now said that the whole question, so far as I am concerned at least, is in the hands of the Senator from New Hampshire. If he desires its postponement that he may have an opportunity to deliver his views upon it, I hope there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until the 6th of January next.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the board of visitors of the Naval Academy for the present year.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

Mr. DIXON. A bill was passed by the House of Representatives yesterday to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of this city, so as to extend the time for the completion of their road between Seventeenth street and the Capitol for ten days. The Committee on the District of Columbia, of the Senate, to whom that bill was referred, have directed me to report it back, and to ask for its consideration at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 622) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864. It proposes to amend section seventeen of the act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia, so as to extend the time for the completion of their railroad line, except the part between Seventeenth street and the Capitol, for one year from the passage of this act; but the line from Seventeenth street and the Capitol is to be completed, equipped, and running within ten days from the passage of this act.

Mr. DIXON. I will state that the extension for one year referred to in the bill for part of the road from here to the navy-yard, is really but an extension of three months, because the charter of the company already allows them until the 1st day of September next to complete that portion of the road. As regards the other portion of the road, I believe they are compelled to have it finished by this time, or at any rate by the 1st of January, and they desire an extension of that time. This bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives gives them but ten days to finish this portion of the road. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "thirty," so as to give them thirty days within which to complete the road from Seventeenth street to the Capitol.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes sixteen, noes not counted.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether this concerns the F street railroad or the Pennsylvania avenue railroad?

Mr. DIXON. The F street road. That portion for which the time is extended is on F street.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to be informed by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia if the friends of the road desire the change to be made that he has suggested. I am very well aware that the change is going to jeopard the passage of the bill in the House of Representatives, where I understand there is no quorum, or is likely to be none, and that the charter will be forfeited by our amending the bill and thus sending it back to the House. I think the gentlemen who are interested in this project were satisfied with the proposition as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and my mind is inclined to the opinion that we had better allow it to go back to the House of Representatives as they passed it, without amendment, and let it become a law.

Mr. DIXON. I suppose the friends of the road are in favor of this change. I have received a note, which to be sure is not signed, but was handed to me by the Senator from New Hampshire, and represented by him to come from the friends of the measure, in which they state that the F street road cannot be completed in ten days in the present unsettled condition of the weather. The company ask that the bill be amended in the Senate as follows: strike out "ten days" and insert "thirty days" for the F street road; and strike out "one year" and insert "two years" for the branches. That I have not done, because I thought that as they have already three months from September next, they might ask for an extension at any future time with regard to that. It is very apparent, as is stated in this note, that in the present condition of the weather it is very difficult to work upon the road, and probably it will be impossible to finish it in ten days. It seemed to me, therefore, and to the committee, that the extension of thirty days should be made.

Mr. CLARK. I think I can answer directly the question proposed by the Senator from Iowa. The friends of the road do desire this extension. They will go on and complete the road at the earliest possible moment, but they fear the weather may be such that they may want more than ten days, and may have to ask for more; and so, as a matter of precaution, they ask for thirty days at this time.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTE.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 367) to repeal the provision of law requiring certain regents of the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I scarcely know to what committee it would be desirable to refer this bill, and unless somebody wishes it referred, I shall ask the Senate to act upon it at once. If the Senate will indulge me for one moment in making an explanation of it, I think there will be no objection to it.

The act establishing the Smithsonian Institution provided that two of the regents should be residents of the city of Washington and members of the National Institute in the city of Washington. The National Institute was an incorporated association, and its charter has expired. It did not meet with much success; it has been dissolved; and there are now no members of the National Institute. There is a vacancy in the board of regents, occasioned by the death of General Totten, which needs to be filled, but it cannot be filled by the appointment of a resident of Washington and a member of this Institute, as there are no longer any members of this Institute. The object of this bill is to repeal that provision of the law which requires that two regents should be members of the National Institute. I hope the Senate will let the bill pass at once, as it is desirable to fill that vacancy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know that I understand the gentleman aright. Is it proposed to repeal that part of the law which requires them to be inhabitants of Washington?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; not at all. I ask the Secretary to read the bill again, so that the Senator from Vermont may see that it does not repeal that part of the law requiring them to be residents of Washington.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the "Act to establish the Smithsonian Institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men" as requires that two of the regents of said Institution shall be members of the National Institute in the city of Washington, be, and the same is, hereby, repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. DIXON. Having been appointed chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I ask to be excused from service on the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, of which committee I have also the honor of being chairman.

The request was granted.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, it was Ordered, That so much of the 35th rule of the Senate as relates to the appointment of the chairmen of committees be suspended as regards the appointment of the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and that the said chairman be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

BILL BECAME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. JOHN G. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that he had this day approved and signed the bill (S. No. 358) to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy.

FREEDOM TO SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

Mr. WILSON. Senate joint resolution No. 82 was the special order for to-day at one o'clock, but was temporarily laid aside to take up other business. I move now to proceed to the consideration of that joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will leave the resolution of my colleague the order of the day for to-morrow. There is important business which must be acted on to-day in executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of privilege. I move to strike out such portion of the Journal as refers to the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] with reference to retaliation upon rebel prisoners for the treatment of our prisoners in their hands. I am placed in the predicament, according to the report of the Globe, of having acquiesced in the passage of the resolution. I was cut off by the objection of the gentleman from New Hampshire before I could make the objection. My friend from New York [Mr. PRUYN] also sought the floor to make objection, and I think if the House understood the tenor of the resolution would reject it at once.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the question before the House?

Mr. COX. I move to correct the proceedings of the House, under the rules, so as to strike out all the proceedings with reference to the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that the Journal is incorrectly made up by the Journal clerk?

Mr. COX. I am not talking on that question. The SPEAKER. Then the Chair decides that the gentleman's motion is not in order.

Mr. COX. I move to expunge that resolution from the Journal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the question of order that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the 39th rule requires that every written motion made in the House shall be inserted on the Journal, and that the Speaker shall revise and correct the Journal every morning before it is read to the House. There is a question of privilege if the charge is made that the Speaker has mutilated the Journal. That was decided in the Thirty-First Congress to be a question of privilege. If the gentleman wishes to expunge the resolution he must wait until resolutions are in order. But the Journal must state what occurred, and it is not a question of privilege to move to strike out what did occur.

Mr. COX. I call the attention of the Speaker to that rule which says that the House may judge of what are or are not its proceedings. I hope, in the interest of humanity, that the House will look at this resolution and reject it.

The SPEAKER. The rule just quoted does not apply to this point.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will permit me to make a statement on this point, inasmuch as he has referred to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that this is not a question of privilege. The Chair has no objection to this conversational debate if the House has none. But if the point is made by any member debate must be arrested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe the gentleman from Ohio did not object to the resolution yesterday. I see so in the Globe.

Mr. COX. That is it. I wish to correct that.

I intended to have objected to that resolution, but the Speaker was rather prompt, I think, upon me. I have no complaint, however, to make of his general good conduct, but I think that if the House had heard the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire read again, there would have been a whole chorus of objections. I am induced now to make this motion by gentlemen upon both sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House. The Chair must state that so far from being over-prompt on the gentleman from Ohio, the rule states that no resolution shall be debated on the day on which it is presented, and no debate was therefore allowable. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution. The gentleman from Ohio rose and debated it at some little length, giving his views in regard to the proposition. The Chair was not disposed to check him until the gentleman from New Hampshire rose and objected to debate. The Chair then asked the gentleman from Ohio if he objected or not, and the gentleman did not object, and the Chair then put the question to the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I desired and asked for a second reading of the resolution, because it was so imperfectly heard by me at the distance that I sat from the Chair that I did not understand its entire purport. The Speaker, of course, did not hear me express the desire to have the resolution read a second time. I certainly should have objected if I had understood its character.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] that probably the reason why the gentleman was not recognized was because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] was speaking, as he was from the moment the resolution was introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. PRUYN. I did not mean to impute to the Chair any discourtesy; certainly not.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. ELIOT, KELLEY, and NOBLE managers on the part of the House of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

DUTIES ON TOBACCO.

Mr. KASSON. I ask leave to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw it.

Mr. KASSON then, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for an act to levy duties upon tobacco and its manufactures; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MUSTERING OF SUBSTITUTES.

Mr. COFFROTH asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Military Committee is hereby instructed to report, by bill or otherwise, an additional section to "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, to allow any person or persons drafted or subject to draft to muster into the service of the United States substitutes at any place where a mustering officer is stationed, and such substitute shall be credited to any town, township, ward of a city, precinct, or election district of the congressional district in which the person or persons reside at the time said substitute is accepted.

Mr. SCHENCK. That resolution instructs the committee absolutely to report. I will object to it unless it be modified so as to instruct the committee to inquire into the propriety of reporting.

Mr. COFFROTH. I will modify it in that sense.

The resolution was accordingly modified; and there being no objection, it was read, considered, and agreed to.

NAVAL EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the report of the First Comptroller, showing the appropriations and expenditures of that Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act for the relief of Charles M. Pott, and an act to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from public stores; when the Speaker signed the same.

POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law all persons connected with the Post Office Department, as postmasters or carriers of the mail, from having any pecuniary or business interest in any express office or express company for the transfer of express matter, and report their conclusions to the House by bill or otherwise.

LETTER-CARRIER SYSTEM.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to consider the expediency of repealing so much of the existing postal laws as requires and provides for the free delivery of letters in cities and large towns, and restoring the system of delivery which existed previous to the enactment of the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

CLAIMS OF NAVAL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission to settle and adjust the claims of certain contractors with the Navy Department.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.
Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

EXCHANGE OF NAVAL PRISONERS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw that call.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw it.
Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the House, if not inconsistent with the public welfare, what measures, if any, have been taken to exchange the officers and men belonging to the United States Navy now held as prisoners by the rebels, and what obstacles, if any, now exist to the exchange of such prisoners.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the resolution be amended by striking out the word "requested" and inserting the word "directed."

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. WILSON. I object, unless the change suggested by the gentleman from Illinois be made.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I accept the modification.

There being no objection, the resolution, as modified, was read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. COX. What has become of the other resolution on the subject?

The SPEAKER. It has been laid over under the rule.

Mr. COX. Is not this a resolution to the same purport?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. Well, I object, unless—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection is too late. The resolution has been introduced and agreed to.

DUTY ON PRINTING PAPER.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of reducing or suspending the import duties upon printing paper; and that they be, and are hereby, requested to report by bill or otherwise at an early day.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM NEVADA.

Mr. HIGBY stated that Mr. HENRY G. WORTHINGTON, member-elect from the State of Nevada, was present and ready to take the oath of office.

Mr. WORTHINGTON presented himself, and the prescribed oath was administered to him by the Speaker.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to amend an act for the removal of the Winnebago Indians, and for the sale of their reservation in Minnesota, for their benefit; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the regular order of business; and the Speaker proceeded, as the first business in order, to call the committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Territories, where the call had previously been suspended.

The call of the committees was concluded, no reports being presented.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of resolutions calling for information, and lying over under the rules. The first in order is that presented on the 7th day of December by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to this House what obstacles, if any, now interpose to prevent an early and full exchange of prisoners of war now held by the rebels.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when that resolution was presented, I moved to amend it by substituting a resolution which I subsequently offered and which was accepted by the gentleman who offered this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the motion to amend was not in order at that time, when the resolution was lying over under the rules. The gentleman from Ohio on the same day offered a resolution relating to the same subject. He can now offer that as an amendment.

Mr. COX. I will do so. I move to amend this resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu of the words stricken out the following:

That, if not incompatible with the public interest, all communications in reference to the exchange of prisoners, not heretofore published, be communicated to this House by the Secretary of War.

My object in offering this amendment is, not that we may have the suppositions or inferences of the Secretary of War as to obstacles in reference to an exchange of prisoners, but that we may have all the facts and correspondence in his possession relating to this matter.

As the House is aware, there is a long history connected with this subject. Soon after the beginning of the war we adopted, in the interest of decency and humanity, a joint resolution recognizing a full, fair exchange of prisoners; and a cartel was made for that purpose. I am not now here to inquire what obstructions have been supposed to impede this exchange. It has been stated that difficulties have occurred on account of the negro soldiers. Perhaps that is to some extent true. There may be other reasons why the rebels have not been prompt, or why our Government has not been prompt, to exchange prisoners. We ought to have all the correspondence on this subject, and not merely the ideas of the Secretary of War as to what may be an impediment or obstruction to the making of exchanges.

In connection with this matter I desire to say a word in reference to the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS.] I presume that it is in order to refer to that. I think that if that resolution had been fully understood it would have been recognized by gentlemen on both sides of the House as revolting to a proper sense of humanity. It provides for inflicting upon the rebel prisoners who may be in our hands the same horrible, inhuman, barbarous treatment which has been inflicted upon our soldiers held as prisoners by the rebels. It is proposed, in other words, that we shall adopt, to the fullest extent, the law of retaliation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it does not follow that, because the rebels have made brutes and fiends of themselves, we are bound to do the same thing; but this House should, I think, at once have signalized its abhorrence of such a resolution by expunging it from the Journal.

There is a certain law of retaliation in war, I know, but no man will stand up here and say, after due reflection, that he would reduce these prisoners thrown into our hands into the same condition exhibited by these skeletons, these pictures, these anatomies brought to our attention and laid upon the desks of members of Congress.

I know, Mr. Speaker, from men returned from Andersonville, and other prisons in the South, that there is good foundation for their terrible reports in relation to the treatment of our prisoners, and, as a man who has a heart, and as a man who has brothers in our Army liable any moment to be treated in the most abhorrent way by the rebels, I make my protest here against the passage of that resolution, or to its being reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs except for its emphatic rejection. We on this side of the House have no power to stop this war, and for the next four years it will likely go on, but we can mitigate its severity by introducing a humane code.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend will not raise the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to suggest to my colleague that the resolution adopted yesterday is only one of inquiry. It does not call for retaliation, but only asks the Committee on Military Affairs to report as to the propriety or impropriety of retaliation.

Mr. COX. I would not have the committee consider so horrible and atrocious a proposition.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I wish to state to the House that when I submitted my resolution, yesterday, the Speaker asked the gentleman whether he objected to it, and he distinctly replied that he did not. And no objection was made to my resolution from that side of the House.

Mr. COX. That is true so far as the gentleman states it, but I intended in the further debate to say that I would not object to it provided it could be debated; and if it had been debated I knew it would have been rejected by gentlemen on that side of the House. I was cut off by the gentleman from further debate. Members around me do not hear distinctly all that is done. I could not hear the gentleman's proposition when it was first read. Gentlemen on that side heard it themselves, and supposed that we heard it. My friend from New York [Mr. PRYOR] could not catch the purport of it. But it is before the House, before the country, as having been passed by the House at least as a subject of inquiry by one of our committees, and I hope the House will in some way give its stamp of disapprobation to the resolution. It is laid down by all respectable authorities that when revolution reaches such a formidable height as this the laws of humanity or the laws of moderation obtain as between two belligerents; and there is no law of humanity more sacred than that in reference to the treatment of prisoners, and it does not follow, because our prisoners are treated in the way represented, and no doubt truthfully represented, in the preamble to the gentleman's resolution, that our Government should make itself the brate that the gentleman charges upon the rebel authorities. I do not believe that the President or the Secretary of War would sanction any such proceeding. I am sure that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs would not do so. Indeed, I have heard that he disapprobates the resolution; and I hope, Mr. Speaker, the House will in some emphatic way express its opinion of it by rejecting it at once when it comes before them.

We are at this time in need of all the information in the hands of the War Department. There has been a good deal of trouble about it. Why were not these exchanges made? Is there any portion of responsibility for these horrible atrocities upon our Government because we did not exchange prisoners in time? I do not make that charge, but I say that we want all the correspondence on the subject, that such an imputation may be refuted. Our prisoners want to know that the Government has not been derelict in this matter. I call the previous question if gentlemen do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Ohio if he prefers it to the original, though I do not very well see what advantage will result to have this resolution adopted. All this matter is, under our system, intrusted to the Executive and the War Department. I do not precisely see what this House is to do upon receiving the information. Is the information asked for as a matter of curiosity, or is there some action to be taken upon it?

Mr. COX. If the gentleman asks me I will say that I would predicate some action upon it if the facts demanded it. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a humane man, would insist on a fair exchange of prisoners, and would stir up the War Department to that end if they have been backward.

Mr. STEVENS. This resolution seems to imply, by its being offered, that the War Department has been remiss. Now, sir, unless I have some such suspicion, I do not know why I should interfere with them. If I believed they were derelict in their duty, if I thought they were not doing all that, under the laws of war, and the laws of humanity, they ought to do, I would pass some censure upon them. But I have not yet seen anything to induce me to believe that.

I understand the gentleman to condemn the system of retaliation, and to find fault with the resolution already passed from discussion, the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] because it looks to retaliation. Now, sir, I do not agree to that doctrine at all. Retaliation is one of the laws of war. It has been exercised ever since wars existed, whether in barbarian or civilized countries; and it may be that it will be absolutely necessary to retaliate upon the enemy in order to compel them to be humane. And although retaliation may sometimes operate very severely upon innocent persons who may be the subjects of it, it may become essential to practice it; but the Government which has caused the necessity is the one responsible for it. If any Government executes any of our soldiers contrary to the laws of war, is it not a matter of fair retaliation to execute as many of their men, although innocent; and is there any other way to check it? I know of none. To say, therefore, that retaliation is not humane, is not in accordance with the general sense of civilized warfare. Nor do I see how it would be possible to keep a savage and cruel enemy within the rules of humanity unless retaliation were allowed, and unless it were known that it would be practiced.

As to the causes which have retarded the exchange of prisoners, I do not know whether there is any one who is censurable. I do not know that it is alleged. If there is, it would be well enough to inquire into it; and if the gentleman thinks there is anything not communicated to the public upon that subject I should certainly have no objection to ask for that correspondence. I cannot at the present see precisely what good is to come from it. The resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of all these things, and it seems to me that it will be properly met at the Department. I therefore move to refer this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs. I suppose that will answer the purpose of the gentleman.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope that course will not be adopted, and I hope this resolution will be passed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says, and says very properly, that unless this inquiry is prompted by a vain curiosity the information should be furnished to the House. There is one fact I suppose well known to every gentleman upon this floor, and that is that great discontent prevails in relation to this exchange. A deep impression has been produced upon the people of the country, and these accounts of barbarities inflicted upon Union prisoners by the South have filled the country with horror. They are discontented with the condition of affairs. They think it ought not so to continue, and they believe it is not necessary that it should continue. I am not prepared to say that anybody is at fault; but I am prepared to say that the people believe somebody is at fault, and if nobody is at fault the War Department should be prepared to show to the country that everything has been done that can be done to relieve the people from their suspicions that our citizens who are captured are needlessly suffering.

Now, I happen to have before me a newspaper containing an account of the sufferings of two citizens of Cincinnati who have been eight and ten months in Libby prison, and who have not been exchanged, and cannot be exchanged; and this paper, though friendly to the Administration, and to the gentleman having charge of the War Department, charges upon them that they have been derelict in duty. I am not prepared to say that the paper is right; I do not make any charge of that kind; but I say that we should furnish to the people of the country a knowledge of the facts, and the only way is to give the Administration and the War Department an opportunity to let the people see what efforts they have made to relieve the condition of affairs. I trust, therefore, that the resolution will not be referred, but that opportunity will be given to the War Department to do itself justice, if injustice has been done it; and if not, it will give us an opportunity to predicate that action which will require that justice shall be done to our citizens.

Mr. COX. I think I can answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in such a way as to get his assistance in the passage of this resolution. He thinks that there is some imputation in the introduction of this resolution, or by its terms, upon the Secretary of War. That is not the case. The resolution simply asks the Secretary of War, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send us all the correspondence upon this subject. There is no imputation contained in it, direct or implied; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in favor of this system of retaliation—

Mr. STEVENS. Let me say to the gentleman that if I were quite sure that the amendment would prevail I would withdraw my motion; and I will do so for the purpose of trying it.

Mr. COX. Very well. I will add but one more remark in response to another made by the gentleman. The resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] has been referred, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants it considered. I am surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania justifies that resolution on the ground of retaliation as something known to the laws of civilized warfare. There are laws for war, and one of the laws of war provides for the humane, kind, and just treatment of all prisoners taken even in civil war. I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not put the torture or the thumb-screw or reduce to skeletons the prisoners in our hands because the other side have done it. I do not believe so ill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as that. But as he wants the matter investigated by the committee, this correspondence would evidently assist that committee in the investigation. Let them have all the light which the War Department can throw upon the subject, so that the gentleman from New Hampshire may have the subject of his resolution properly investigated.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to offer an amendment, which he may accept or allow me to take a vote upon?

Mr. COX. I will hear it read.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

And that he report therewith whether the treatment by the United States Government of rebel prisoners under its control is better in respect to food, clothing, care, and attention than the treatment extended by the rebel authorities to prisoners captured by them; and whether, in his judgment, the same provisions for the custody and care of rebel prisoners extended by these authorities to our captured soldiers may be properly extended to their soldiers when captured by us, with a view to secure more humane treatment of prisoners by the rebels.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio that my object is that his application for information, to which I think there is no valid objection, shall go to the same committee to which the other resolution was referred, so that we may have the benefit of a full statement from the Secretary of War of the facts upon each side, and that he may state the opinion of himself, as the head of that Department, whether the proposed measure would have the effect to increase humanity toward our prisoners in the South. I can see no objection to taking the opinion of the War Department upon that subject.

I renew the motion withdrawn by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.] to refer this whole subject to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] is on the floor.

Mr. COX. I only yielded to my friend from Iowa to offer his amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I ought to add, in the hearing of the gentleman from Ohio, that the difference in the treatment of prisoners is notorious to the people of the United States, but my object is to get a specific statement of that difference not merely that it may go to the people of the United States, but to Europe, where there has been a recent manifesto of the rebel authorities touching our inhumanity toward these prisoners. I wish to call out a full statement, showing the rations, care, place of custody, and all the facts in contrast to the inhumanity practiced by the rebels.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment, except the last clause. I do not care, and I do not think the House would care, to have the opinion of the Secretary of War as to the subject of retaliation; whether it would bring about a more humane treatment of our prisoners or not. I will accept the first clause of the gentleman's amendment, so that the Secretary can report on the comparative treatment of prisoners on either side.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest to him that the last clause is important, because we wish to know whether such action on our part would be practicable.

Mr. COX. I do not care anything about the opinion of the Secretary of War, with all due courtesy to him. I want the facts. I will accept the first part of the gentleman's amendment as an amendment to mine; but I cannot accept the last part of it.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Ohio yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa to allow him to offer an amendment? If so, the whole of the amendment can be voted on.

Mr. COX. I only yielded for the purpose of having it read.

The SPEAKER. Then the latter part of the amendment is not pending before the House.

Mr. COX. I modify my own amendment so as to take in the first part of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss at the present time the subject of retaliation. I do not understand that that question is properly before the House. When that subject shall be presented in any practical shape for the action of the House it will present a very grave and serious question; one which, I trust, this House will not act upon without due deliberation and consideration. But, sir, with reference to the resolution which is now before the House, I desire to say that it is a resolution which, in my opinion, is demanded by the public sentiment of the country. There is hardly a fire-side, sir, in the land which is not painfully interested, immediately or remotely, in the question raised by this resolution—the question of a speedy and general exchange of prisoners. I do not regard the resolution or the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] as containing any imputation either on the Administration or on the War Department of the Administration. It conveys no such imputation. It simply calls for information with reference to that in which the people of the country feel a very deep and earnest interest. I have never yet seen the man who has been able to give me an intelligible account of what has occurred with reference to the negotiations that have taken place in regard to the exchange of prisoners, or what have been precisely the obstacles in the way of a general exchange of prisoners. The people of the country desire information upon this subject—nay, I may use a stronger term—they demand information on this subject; and the resolution being properly guarded so as not to require the Secretary of War to impart any information that may be detrimental to the public interests, I am in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio.

Sir, we cannot conduct the Government on the idea that a call for information from a Department of the Government is, as has been suggested, a reflection on the integrity of the Government or on the ability with which the functions of that Department has been discharged. We cannot administer the Government on any such false idea. It has been always administered heretofore on a totally different principle; and that principle has been that the people are entitled to and shall have full, complete, and perfect information on all matters relating to public affairs, so far as such information is not for the time being incompatible with the general interests of the country or the proper administration of the Government.

In my view, therefore, sir, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio calling for the correspondence on this subject conveys no imputation upon the Government. It calls for nothing that could be detrimental to the public interests. It calls for information on a subject in which the people of this country feel a very deep interest, and for the correspondence of their public agents upon that subject. For these reasons I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and shall vote for it.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, in regard to this resolution I accept the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] as the indication of a new era in the conduct of this war. He stands forth in bold relief on this floor and in this debate as compared with his colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.] It is impossible, on this or on any question relative to the treatment of men, prisoners or otherwise, arrayed in arms against us or with us, to separate the motive from the practice. I am astonished at the coolness and the somewhat callous character of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] who, while defending by his words, though perhaps not by his motive, the barbarous resolution which gave rise to the present debate, introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] favored the barbarous principle of the lex talionis, declaring it to be one of the principles of civilized war.

Retaliation is indeed practiced in civilized warfare, but there is a wide and clear distinction between such retaliation and the horrors which the resolution just introduced called on us to imitate in a spirit of resentment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to my astonishment, seems to make no such distinction in his remarks just made.

And I regret to say, sir, that his word has been, in more than one instance, carried out by a systematic practice during the whole course of this war with regard to the treatment of prisoners, not only on our side but also on the other side. It is under just this principle that the abominable acts described in the pamphlets which are circulated throughout the country have been brought about. The massacre at Fort Pillow and the outrages which have been carried on by the soldiery on both sides in the heat of conflict should not find support and palliation here. Sir, I should have been disposed to remain silent and wait until the accumulation of evidence had crushed the cruel spirit from the Administration party on this floor by the mere weight of public odium; but the occasion has occurred, and I deem it due to a portion of this House, on the other side as well as on this, to show a spirit to join them now, even at this late day, in an effort to stop the horrid system of carnage, torture, and barbarity which this civil war has developed.

Upon the field of battle, and in the victory which follows, the soldier is comparatively safe from the infliction of these barbarities; but in the retreat, whether we look upon the record of the fearful consequences of the expedition on the Red river under General Banks, or whether we look to the fearful system carried on by our victorious generals in the State of Georgia, we find that the women and the children are the victims. While the brave men who do the fighting march in column in the discharge of their duty, the mercantile camp-follower plunders, robs, and tortures, and he accepts the palliation given here, under the law of retaliation, as his shield. Under that he toils day and night with blood upon his hands without courage in his heart.

I am glad to find, sir, that gentlemen on the other side are ready to come forward and to vindicate their humanity on this question. Their courage has been proved here. Now, in the hour of triumph, amenity should crown their glorious deeds. We will give you all the credit of your achievements in this war; we will allow you to bestow on your successful generals the highest honors; we will remain silent as you pass onward in your triumphal marches from the Alban mount to the Capitol. But do not let barbarity mark the train of your victories. Do not imitate, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would seem to urge, the leat talionis of the Romans. Let no shackled victim, no bleeding corse, be chained to your car of victory. In that spirit I accept the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] who has last spoken.

But, sir, there is more. There is a future to which we must look. I would ask that hereafter, as now, that spirit might prevail on this floor. I deem it the duty of this House, without regard to what may be the private sentiments of the Secretary of War, to assert that, as men, we are opposed to any law which is not recognized as binding upon a Christian people. "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," should not be engraven upon our banners, nor practiced in our persons.

Mr. COX. I call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK addressed the Chair.

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman, and withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, during the last session of this Congress a resolution was adopted directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire concerning the treatment of our prisoners in the hands of the rebels. In obedience to that order of the House the committee proceeded, as opportunity presented itself, in the midst of other engagements, to take a large mass of testimony, which accumulated upon their hands, in relation to this matter. The end of the session found us with this testimony partially arranged and with a report partly prepared. That report would have been made in the course of this session, and probably at an early day, with such material as we had then obtained for the purpose, if it had not been for the revival of the subject here at this time. Now it is hard to say when, where, and how we may report, for the subject of the inquiry is continually spreading itself as we turn our attention to it. The treatment of our prisoners—horrible enough, as it had come to our knowledge during the last session—has been increased in horror and barbarity since; and the testimony (much as there was of it) which we then obtained would be added to tenfold now if all the facts could be developed. Yesterday the House referred to that committee, or sent to that committee, a resolution directing them to inquire again in relation to this subject. The committee have already had the matter under consideration, and propose to make the examination as thorough as possible, and to report to the House according to the lights before them.

Now, sir, so far as this resolution is concerned, as a member of that committee, and its chairman, I must say to the House that I care very little whether the House makes the call directly upon the Secretary of War or leaves the committee to do so. The House may be sure, and my colleague and gentlemen upon both sides of the Hall, that that committee will seek from the proper Department, and from all quarters connected with that Department, all information on that subject, in order to an enlightened presentment of it for the consideration of the House. I have nothing further to say on that. The House may make the inquiry directly, or leave the committee to make the inquiry by referring this resolution to them with the others that have been referred; and I think that the House may be assured, if this resolution as it stands, indicating a direction of inquiry which gentlemen on either side of the House may think proper, be referred to that committee, the committee will follow that direction, as they probably would have done if the resolution had not been offered. On the whole, I prefer, however, that the subject should be referred to the committee, hoping that we shall make the earliest report possible after we have procured all the information on the subject.

Mr. THAYER. Does the resolution to which the gentleman refers provide for obtaining this correspondence?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that it does; but we will get all the information we can. I believe that the resolution passed yesterday looks to an inquiry into the question whether we ought to resort to some form of retaliation by way of deterring the rebels from such treatment of our prisoners as have fallen into their hands. I am glad that it was referred only as a subject of inquiry, and that the committee were not directed absolutely to report any system of retaliation. I am glad of it because it will require a great deal of consideration by members of the committee, by the members of the House, and by the country, how far it will be proper to resort to any retaliatory measures. I confess that to myself the idea of retaliating in kind is abhorrent to every feeling of my nature. I do not propose to starve, to leave in nakedness, to pen up like cattle, to expose in every form to a lingering death, the prisoners in our hands. I would prefer to kill them at once; to look upon the war as a war of extermination, giving no quarter and expecting none.

I admit that something must be done; but the nearer you approach the question, as we have discovered in some degree, you will find it surrounded with difficulties, and surrounded with difficulties arising out of this single fact, which gentlemen, some of them, in this Hall for the first time discover, that we are making war with savages and fiends, and that, therefore, so long as we recognize the rules of humanity it becomes difficult for us to meet those who know no such principles, no such rules of conduct, no such warfare as has been recognized heretofore between civilized nations. I know that I do not state the case too strongly. Gentlemen are mistaken—and I was sorry to hear a political view given to the subject by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER]—in supposing that we have just waked up to some new consciousness concerning the matter on this side of the House. It is themselves who seem now, for the first time, to have discovered the fact that we are dealing with savages and fiends who do not understand, and would repel approaches, when made, of a humane character. Within the last fifteen minutes I have conversed in the lobby of this House with a young man, the near relative of a member on this floor, who has just returned from Savannah, and who, when lying grievously wounded upon the ground, crippled for life, was stripped to the skin by a rebel major, and was then turned into one of these rebel pens where thousands of our brave fellows were confined, and where he saw eighty-six hundred of them die from starvation and exposure.

Mr. CHANLER. Honored by the notice of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I will for a moment, in reply to him, state why I spoke as I did. It was not alone with regard to our enemies in their treatment of our prisoners that I spoke, but it was to the systematic barbarity of the principles which have appeared in the reports emanating from the Military Committee, over which the gentleman from Ohio presides, that I referred in reference to the barbaric nature of the proposition for the enrollment of our troops; and I defy any civilized nation to surpass it, though some have equaled it, in the intolerable cruelty of the gentleman's own proposition, when, upon this floor, in the face of the American people, he declared—though it was voted down by the House as an indignity to itself—that he intended to kick the people on the one hand and coax them on the other. That was the sentiment I understood him to utter, and I refer to the records of the House to sustain my charge. By this proposition to exclude from any chance of obtaining substitutes all but sons and brothers he has branded his name with infamy.

Let him go to France. This country was made to glow with the torch of the French invader long before the system of political retaliation induced the court of Louis to take arms against England for vengeance for the loss of Canada, and this whole country was made red with the barbarities of the French army. And are we to follow the military system of that nation now and forever? Sir, there are two sides to this question of cruelty. Sir, I allude to this as the first instance—and I maintain that so far as the honorable gentleman from Ohio is concerned it is the first instance—of the manifestation of one glimmering ray of light in his own mind that we have as a nation a humane duty to perform in the conduct of this war. We have been instrumental, through the policy shaped in his committee, of reducing this war to one of extermination, and, in his own words, now propose to show no quarter or consideration to the enemy, and at the same time, as he has already shown, no consideration to the poor victims who under the enrollment law have been forced into our armies against their will and contrary to their sense of right and duty.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not intend to yield my time to the gentleman to discuss questions outside of the debate as it has progressed thus far.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and I will not pursue the subject further. I was only answering the gentleman's imputations.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman wants to make any inquiry as to what I have stated, or any suggestion as to my statement about the treatment of prisoners, I will yield to him.

Mr. CHANLER. It was in regard to the allegation of the awakening sense of propriety upon my part that I was making my own defense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to the floor if he insists upon it.

Mr. COX. I believe I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has spoken once, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has the floor by right.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I yield to any remarks the gentleman desires to make in regard to an awakening sense of propriety upon my part.

Mr. COX. For the information of my colleague I want to say one word. I intended to call the previous question before this debate took its present turn of a partisan character.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is not responsible for that.

Mr. COX. And I never have since this question was mooted in this Congress; I have always presented propositions in the interest solely of our soldiers, and I believe my colleague will so regard all that I have said, and I will accept all he says in the same spirit. I have had near and dear friends, as he has had, in these prisons, and from time to time I have been permitted to make inquiries, in order, if possible, to keep these Departments up to their proper work. Weary months have transpired without anything being done by the War Department to facilitate the exchange of prisoners, and although there are rebel barbarities, and although all my colleague may say is true, I am not sure that a large part of this responsibility may not rest upon the War Department for not exchanging prisoners; but in order to answer any such imputations made by the people and made by partisans, the gentleman, my colleague, should not seek to stifle any proper inquiry. He says he may make an inquiry for himself and for his committee. I prefer to have it made with more authority for the House and for the corresponding public, not only that Congress may know, but that the people and the friends of the prisoners may know, why this exchange has been so long obstructed.

Mr. SCHENCK. There can be no misunderstanding about this matter. I made the remark when I was up before—and if the gentleman from New York had not interrupted me I do not know that I should have continued these remarks further—that I was perhaps almost indifferent upon the question whether the call be made directly by the House or be left to be made by the committee. I recognize the propriety of getting this information, and I only thought that it would expedite possibly the means by which it should be obtained if we should go on with our inquiry, and call, perhaps, the Commissary General of Prisoners before us, as well as make inquiries and seek responses from the head of the Department. But all that I leave with the House, promising only that we will go on to the best of our ability and make investigation of and report upon this subject in whatever form it comes before the committee.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether he thinks that the Department would furnish this correspondence to the committee as readily as it would to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should think they would not refuse it.

Mr. GANSON. I did not know whether any inquiry had been made by the committee for this correspondence.

Mr. SCHENCK. I confess, myself, that we are, up to this point, all of us pretty much in the dark in regard to knowing precisely what have been at least all of the obstructions in the way of exchange.

There is this, however, that I feel it due to the Department to state to the House, that while during the past summer no exchanges had been made, and our friends, and the people at large, and all of us, were becoming impatient on that subject, and it seemed almost to be a fair conclusion that it would be proper to swap man for man, because we had more men to spare than the rebels, yet if any such policy or thought did impress itself upon the Department or those who have the administration of our military affairs, every such idea seems to be given up now, and I do not know that any such idea ever was really entertained. There has now been set on foot a system of exchange, and the matter is in some degree expedited and facilities are afforded upon the one side and the other looking to the better treatment of prisoners and to the continuance of the exchange, which indicates that the whole subject is upon a somewhat better footing than ever before up to this time. I do not say that it might not and may not be put upon a still better footing; but that being all that I can say upon the subject, said only in these general terms, I am not prepared to substitute it for the information which the House or the committee should seek in the matter.

One word only in answer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] The House will bear me witness that the allusion that I made to this subject as having any political aspect given to it, was one only of regret. An honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] had spoken upon the subject, and was congratulated then by the gentlemen upon the other side of the House with the assertion that there seemed to be, as indicated by his remarks, a new era arisen when gentlemen upon this side of the House were awake to the propriety of looking to the condition of our poor fellows held in this miserable and horrible bondage. I felt that that was an improper bringing in of a political view to be mixed up with this subject; and I thought I administered a very proper and deserved reprehension to the gentleman by turning his attention to the fact that, for the first time now, he seems to have waked up to the fact that we are dealing, as we have always said upon this side, with savages and fiends, in their conduct upon this subject which we are discussing, and they are yet the very men toward whom he has never thought of anything except breathing conciliation and kindness and sympathy, if not actual and direct cooperation.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has imputed motives to me with regard to this matter which is disorderly, according to my notion.

The SPEAKER. The words excepted to will be taken down.

Mr. CHANLER, (the words having been taken down.) The words excepted to are these, "and they are yet the very men toward whom he has never thought of anything except breathing conciliation and kindness and sympathy, if not actual and direct cooperation." I claim, sir, that these words are out of order as imputing to me motives unworthy of a member upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from New York in the course of his remarks stated that the gentleman from Ohio had branded himself with infamy. If the gentleman from New York had been called to order the Chair would have sustained the point of order. The words to which the gentleman takes exception the Chair thinks are in order and within the limits of legitimate debate. The Chair thinks they are certainly justifiable, on the principle of retaliation, which appears to be the subject of debate now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. Retaliation as exercised by the Presiding Officer?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must permit the Chair to finish the ruling on the point of order. The Chair does not think, even apart from the subject under discussion, that the words complained of are in violation of the rules of debate. They may be correct or not correct, but the Chair does not think that they come under the character of disorderly words.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the gentleman will allow me to reply.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am released from my parole. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Since the words have been brought so conspicuously before the House, let me be clearly understood, so that the gentleman himself may not fail to have had due explanation. I had inferred from the previous course of that gentleman that he had manifested sympathy, kindness, and conciliation toward those rebels whose conduct is now, on all hands, admitted to be fiendish. I said, therefore, that those had been his relations to the rebels in my opinion, if there had not been direct cooperation with them on his part. I meant to distinguish between direct cooperation and the other. I have never suspected that the gentleman from New York would fight out his principles on the side of the rebels by direct cooperation. I wanted to draw that distinction clearly, that the gentleman, while not taking part by direct cooperation, while not carrying a musket to defend that which he contended for, has done all that he could, by a gentlemanly and amiable courtesy and sympathy with the rebels, to encourage those who carried muskets on their shoulders in that cause.

The gentleman from New York went out of the way to charge me with tyranny, and I do not know but that on the next occasion I am to be introduced into some resolution of inquiry for having undertaken a system of savage tyranny over the people of the country, by seeking to make as stringent as possible a system of enrollment by which our Army should be kept full. Sir, I have heard all that before, inside of this House and outside of this House; and all that I have to say about it is that it is not the soldiers enlisted, not the soldiers in the field, not those who bear the brunt of the battle and who expose themselves to wounds, to death even, in this cause, who ever complain of the laws being too stringent to fill up the ranks of the Army. Those complaints never come from the parties directly interested, nor from their friends who hold up their hands while they are engaged in this great battle for liberty, for human rights, and for the preservation of the country and of its institutions. The complaints come only from political demagogues, who seek, by stimulating the soldier into dissatisfaction, and by inflaming the popular mind against legislators or against any one legislator, to prevent our giving this aid to our armies. They do not come from those who constitute the armies themselves. That is all that I have to say on that subject. I will not go into any discussion of the enrollment law here. I am much obliged to my colleague for having yielded to me on this subject. I regret that the debate should have taken this turn. It was provoked on the other side, but I am glad to say by only one gentleman on the other side. Whatever may be the course of the House, either in making this call for information directly or in leaving the Committee on Military Affairs to make it, I hope the information which my colleague seeks will be obtained, and that as much light as possible will be thrown on the subject for our guidance.

Mr. COX. I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask to have the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio read now. I think the House on all sides will consent to the adoption of his amendment, pure and simple.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. COX. Before the previous question is seconded, my friend from New York [Mr. CHANLER] feels a personal grievance in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and I consent to yield to him for a reply.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I shall say but a few words.

I deny any implied or direct cooperation with the enemies of my country at any time, in any place; and I demand the proof from the gentleman who has made this imputation. I hold his insinuation as unfair. Sir, I have borne a musket; and I never should have alluded to it but for the ungenerous and unjust imputation with which the gentleman from Ohio closed his remarks. I am ready now to do what I can for the defense of my country, as I was at the very first call. I was among the first who came here in response to that call. I slept in the Halls of this Capitol with the first regiment from my city. I came as a citizen, bearing a musket. I never expected to mention here this humble service to my country; but, in vindication of myself, I feel called upon now to say what, but for the peculiar circumstances, I never would have uttered. I did bear a musket, and I was willing to act so long as I was able. I served out the time of the first call with my regiment. I went still further, (and General Dix can confirm what I now say.) I applied to that general for a position on his staff; but deeming my services not of sufficient importance, he not only refused that application, but was utterly silent as to another request which I made, that he would seek for me an appointment on one of the staffs under him. I blush that I am called upon to make these remarks, but they are in justification of myself. I hope that the gentleman from Ohio will be magnanimous, and apologize for the remarks which he has made.

Mr. COX. I suppose that this matter is now satisfactorily adjusted. No doubt my colleague on the other side [Mr. SCHENCK] is sufficiently ashamed of having attacked a soldier of the Republic. [Laughter.] I therefore call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The Clerk read the amendment in its modified form, as follows:

Resolved, That, if not incompatible with the public interest, all communications in reference to the exchange of prisoners, not heretofore published, be communicated to this House by the Secretary of War; and that he report therewith whether the treatment by the United States Government of rebel prisoners under its control is better in reference to food, clothing, care, and attention than the treatment extended by the rebel authorities to prisoners captured by them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Some of us would desire a separate vote upon that portion of the amendment which proposes to inquire of the Secretary of War whether the Union prisoners have been treated any worse than the rebel prisoners in our hands. We do not want any information on that point. Everybody knows the fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] moved an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGER-SOLL,] and then surrendered the floor temporarily to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who proposed to move an amendment to the amendment, part of which was accepted by the gentleman from Ohio. The remainder was not accepted, and therefore was not moved, the gentleman from Ohio being in possession of the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will we not have an opportunity to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa and permit the amendment of my colleague to pass?

The SPEAKER. No amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is pending. He did not obtain the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment. There is only one amendment pending, that of the gentleman from Ohio, to which he added part of the amendment which the gentleman from Iowa desired to offer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it too late to amend the amendment by striking out that portion?

The SPEAKER. It is too late. The main question has been ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask whether this amendment is not susceptible of division, so that we can vote separately on the second proposition which was accepted as a modification. I prefer the amendment of my colleague precisely as he introduced it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will see that the portion which I accepted at the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa calls for some facts in addition to the correspondence. It does not deprive us of the correspondence.

A MEMBER. It interferes with the committee.

Mr. COX. It does not interfere with the committee. The committee can use all the facts and correspondence.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not divisible. If the latter portion embraced the words "the Secretary of War" instead of the word "he," the amendment would be divisible. It embraces two different propositions, but the language is such that they must be voted on together.

The Clerk again read the amendment as modified.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It seems to me that the first part of that is a separate proposition.

The SPEAKER. But each part must be a substantive proposition. If the House should reject the first part, the last, if adopted, would be a senseless proposition.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Speaker will find, by examining the amendment, that if the last part be stricken out a substantive proposition will remain.

The SPEAKER. But suppose that the first part be stricken out and the last adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We do not ask that; we ask that the last part shall be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. If it be divided, it must be so that either branch, if passed, will make perfect sense by itself. The last branch would not be a substantive proposition, because it says, "and that he report therewith." If, by unanimous consent, "he" were stricken out and "the Secretary of War" inserted, the amendment would be divisible.

Mr. COX. I withdraw that portion of the resolution suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. I want a vote on the resolution as I offered it, and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will be permitted to withdraw that portion of his resolution.

There was no objection; so it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER stated that the question recurred on the following amendment:

Resolved, (if not incompatible with the public interest,) All communications in reference to the exchange of prisoners not heretofore published be communicated to this House by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 380) for the relief of George W. Murray; and

An act (H. R. No. 465) for the relief of Deborah Jones.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was also received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed, without amendment, an act (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up and consider the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 620, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

The bill was read through a first time for information.

Mr. BROOKS obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is understood that, by order of the House, the bill is open to points of order on the several items. I wish to raise a point of order, but do not wish to interfere with the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that by order of the House the bill is open to any exception as to relevancy of the items under the rules of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have a point of order to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received when the paragraph to which it applies is reached.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the gentleman from New York rises for the purpose of general debate, and I will not present my point of order at this time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would be worth while for me to object to these several items, although they involve the appropriation out of the Treasury of $93,600,000, which is the sum total of the deficiencies provided in this bill. These items are not calculated to excite the attention of the House as compared with other and more exciting questions which have been brought before it. Millions have become things of minor importance. Therefore I do not propose to enter into any discussion of them; nor do I propose to renew at this day before this House the remarks I made at the last session of Congress upon these enormous deficiency bills; not only enormous in amount, but in reference to money which has been expended by public officers without any authority of Congress for so doing whatsoever.

I shall not, then, enter into any analysis of this particular deficiency bill—this bill of millions—because I do not think it will avail anything further than the consumption of the time of the House. There are on bills like these only two courses for a member of the Opposition to pursue; and the first of them is to say nothing on appropriations like these, but to encourage gentlemen to offer amendments so as to exhaust as soon as possible the Treasury of the country, and to leave no means for carrying on this war. This is not my mode of opposition. I shall never enter into any opposition of the sort, and I only say that the most effective opposition would be to bankrupt the Treasury and deprive the country by the enormity of these expenditures of any means to carry on the war. I repeat that this is not my mode of opposition. Mine would be to carefully analyze the bill, and call the attention of the House, and especially of the dominant party of the House, to the magnitude of its appropriations. I know if I entered into any such analysis at this time that but little attention would be paid to any exposure I should make. If I did it I should only be wasting the time of the House which might be better appropriated to other purposes.

It is the misfortune of this House—I speak it with no disrespect to any member—that there is not upon that side of the House what has hitherto almost always existed in the dominant party of the country, having control of vast sums of money to appropriate, objectors, cavilers, and debaters of appropriation bills; such men as existed in the Democratic party in former times, when it was in a large majority; one gentleman from the State of North Carolina, one gentleman from the State of Virginia, and another still from the State of Tennessee; men who, though in the dominant party of the country, yet by comparison, by estimates, by analysis, by investigation, and thorough examination from beginning to end, unraveled every item of the appropriation bills, and made the Committee of Ways and Means throughout answer for every item of those bills, for their exactness and their fidelity, before they were satisfied with the appropriations and would assume the responsibility of voting for them.

With the exception of one gentleman on that side of the House, whom I will not name, I regret to say that no such examination is given to their own appropriation bills by the dominant party as has hitherto, through all eras of the Republic, been given by the Democratic party controlling this House, or by the Whigs when they had the majority here. It is a misfortune to the country that there are not more gentlemen upon that side of the House who will exert all their powers and information in investigating, studying, and thoroughly looking into all these bills; for, whatever I may say, and whatever vote may be given by this side of the House, will be imputed to opposition, and will not have respect given to them by gentlemen upon that side.

I see in this bill, as appropriations for deficiencies, four or five several items for this House alone, in the aggregate amounting to $65,000. One of them, without any detail whatever, is mentioned as "miscellaneous items, $34,005 52." The bill containing this miscellaneous item, without any specification of details so far as I know, without any report, without any explanation, was yesterday suddenly brought before this House and set down for action to-day.

"For folding documents, $25,000," is another item in the deficiency bill—an amount expended without any appropriation whatever—and the House is called upon to make up that deficiency for documents already folded for the House. I will not say what the appropriation is for; and if I were to say it was solely for political purposes I should disarm myself of all power of claiming that attention from that side of the House which ought to be given to an item like this. And if I belonged to that side of the House I would certainly condemn an expenditure of $25,000 in the recess of the House, without any authority of law whatever, and out of a fund to be appropriated here in a deficiency bill.

In an item to supply deficiencies for printing there is the enormous appropriation of $720,000. I do not doubt the expenditure was a good degree necessary, but I do say that under a proper administration of this Government, when the public printer has not received authority for the expenditure of public money, it is quite time to stop the public printing until Congress again reassembles and names the necessary expenditure and makes the proper appropriation therefor.

The items of appropriations for the war are enormous, amounting in this bill, from a cursory examination and rough addition, to $92,000,000. I will enter into no examination of those expenditures or of those items, other than to comment upon one, because if I did it would be said that I was in opposition to the war. What I have to say upon that subject is that the Secretary of War ought to comprehend the work which is before him, and in the annual estimates which he submits to Congress estimate sufficient in advance to meet what are likely to be his expenditures, and not, as now, present here this year a deficiency of $92,000,000, when in the deficiency bill of last year I think we appropriated over one hundred million dollars to make up the deficiency in the War Department of the year before. Sir, if there can be expenditures like these without responsibility, or like any of these without appropriations, the whole form of government is ended, and we are but the recording clerks to execute items of appropriation which the Secretary of War may desire, or which other branches of the Government may command.

The money is spent and gone. We shall be told that our generals have found it necessary to expend this money; but here is an expenditure of over $92,000,000, for war purposes without any authority whatsoever from this House, and without any responsibility upon the part of this House. We are called upon in this House to do what an omnipotent British Parliament alone can do, pass a bill of indemnity to the Government for a violation of law—an exercise of power never contemplated by our Constitution, and never intended to be exercised by the House of Representatives.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman from New York mean to say that the proposed appropriation for a deficiency of $92,000,000 is to reimburse what has been already expended without authority of law? That is what I understand him to say.

Mr. BROOKS. What is a deficiency bill?

Mr. KASSON. It is a deficiency for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June next. The amount already appropriated is not yet expended, and this is an additional amount required to carry on the Government up to the 30th of June next. I certainly thought the gentleman from New York understood the terms of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. How do I know that, and how does the gentleman know it?

Mr. KASSON. By reading the title of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. It is a bill for deficiencies, and a deficiency is a deficiency; I cannot define it further than that.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from New York be kind enough to read or to allow me to read the title of the bill? It is "A bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865."

And so it is every year. These appropriations are to carry on the public printing office and the other Departments to the end of the current fiscal year, as on making estimates they find that the present appropriations are not sufficient.

Mr. BROOKS. That is the very same point the gentleman made last year, and he compels me to repeat what I said last year on that subject. The Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, and all the other Secretaries, in a book I have before me of no inconsiderable size, make their estimates of what should be the annual expenditures of the Government, and those estimates, we are informed, are sufficient to carry on the Government for the fiscal year, and hitherto, with the exception perhaps of two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars, the estimates of the Secretaries have been sufficient.

What I complain of in the gentleman from Iowa, and those who are associated with him on the Committee of Ways and Means, is that they do not in preparing the annual appropriation bills search the question and look into the expenditures of the Government, and, if they are not satisfied with the estimates of the Secretaries, allow enough in the annual bills to maintain the Government throughout the fiscal year without presenting to us here at the end, or the middle, or the beginning of the session of Congress, a deficiency bill, as was the case last year, of one hundred and three or one hundred and four million dollars, and here a deficiency of $93,000,000.

A new custom has been introduced; we have two appropriation bills now instead of one. Hitherto the custom has been to have but one. Either the estimates of the Secretary of War and the other Secretaries are all wrong and erroneous or those of the Committee of Ways and Means are, so that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot know what are to be the expenditures of the Government when he looks at these estimates.

The modus operandi in the Treasury I take to be this—indeed, I know it is: the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy place before the Secretary of the Treasury, in November or December, their estimates of what will be required for their Departments. The Secretary of the Treasury receives these estimates and submits them to Congress as the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year. The predecessor of the honorable gentleman who is now Secretary of the Treasury complained, and justly complained, that he knew nothing of what were to be the expenditures of the War Department; that the estimates came in sometimes in the regular form, but oftener in an irregular form; that they came not through him, but often through the Committee of Ways and Means, so that he was obliged to carry on the Government and ask for loans and issue paper money to carry on the Government, while the Secretary of War was all the time deceiving him; I mean it in no offensive sense, but deceiving him as to the expenditures necessary to be made. Under this mode of doing business, the Secretary of the Treasury can know nothing of what is called for. The Secretary of War last year asked for an appropriation of $108,000,000 for deficiencies, which was appropriated; and when these appropriations came in through the deficiency bill, Mr. Chase promptly and justly complained that the Secretary of War had upset his whole system for administering the fiscal Department of this Government. Therefore I say that until the Secretaries make their proper estimates, and until the Committee of Ways and Means give those estimates proper and sufficient attention, it is impossible to carry on the fiscal administration of this Government without the appearance and reappearance in Wall street of the Government demanding loans, or without a call on the Treasury to flood the country with more and more irredeemable paper money.

Mr. Chairman, there are other items in this bill which illustrate, in insignificant detail—so insignificant that I am almost ashamed to mention them—the remarks which I have made or am about to make. There are items for office furniture, for carpeting, for miscellaneous items in the office of the Third Auditor, for the hire of carts, for the police of the Capitol, and for a thousand other little things, which ought not to be in a deficiency bill unless they have been already expended, and which, if expended, ought not to have been expended but by due sanction of law. The Secretary of the Treasury has no right to have a single carpet laid down in his building without due authority of law. This is a Government, or is intended to be a Government, of law; and all the power which this House has left, all that it is likely to have left it, (and that not long, unless it puts its foot down here,) is the holding of the public purse through these appropriation bills. The House should insist that there shall be no expenditures whatsoever without appropriation by law. Neither the President of the United States, the humblest officer within the walls of the Capitol, nor any officer anywhere, however high or low may be his position, has a right, under our theory of Government, to expend a single cent of public money without due appropriation by law. And yet here, in this deficiency bill, all through it, are miscellaneous items unknowing and unknown—appropriations for fuel, labor, light, the extension of the Treasury building, incidental expenses, compensation to clerks, building bridges, stationery, and blank-books—innumerable items. If they have been already expended, it has been without any appropriation by law, and if not already expended, they have no right whatever to be in a deficiency bill, but ought to be in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I know that I am wasting and consuming the time of the House in trying to arrest these wheels of expenditure, and in calling the attention of the committee to these items. I feel, I know, that I am unnecessarily consuming time; and I only do it in the faint hope that I may awaken on the part of the majority a disposition to analyze all the expenditures of the Government. As a mere member of the Opposition, if I desired to throw that party out of power I would rejoice at appropriations such as are presented, and which must in the end lead, if not better guarded, to the bankruptcy of the Treasury. But as I wish to maintain the honor and credit of the Government, and as I am only for economy in the expenditure, I feel it to be my duty to my country, even if I do waste time in it, to try and awaken a spirit in the other side of the House that will prompt the dominant party to exercise that authority and supervision over appropriation bills which has always hitherto been given them by members of the party in power.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not very well understand how a gentleman on this floor can justify himself in occupying the time of the House, and wasting the money of the country, when he tells us on rising and on sitting down that he knows he is doing a vain thing, and that he is just expending time for nothing. If I thought that, sir, I would hold my tongue; unless, indeed, the eloquence of the gentleman from New York, which has been so highly eulogized, and properly, all over the western country, be a sufficient excuse for him in making a dissertation without any specific object, and which he knows can have no effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has not moved to strike out a single item, and has not discussed a single item. But he has read a very wholesome lesson to all the members on this side of the House but one (I do not know who that is) because they do not sufficiently object to items in these bills, and he has particular objection to the action of the Committee of Ways and Means for not scrutinizing them. Will the gentleman tell us what the Committee of Ways and Means have overlooked? Will he tell us in what that committee have been derelict in their duty in reporting these bills? I understand the gentleman to say that the Departments are at fault because they did not make their annual estimates large enough.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman puts to me a question for the purpose of being answered, I will answer him. In this bill I find the following item, beginning at the sixteenth line:

For contingent expenses under the act of August 6, 1846, for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, provided that no part of said sum shall be expended for clerical services, $50,000.

Now, I think that if the Committee of Ways and Means had given the subject due attention, they could have saved that item of $50,000, and made the national banks, which are receiving large favors from the Government, provide for all these expenditures in connection with the transfer and disbursement of the public revenue. That is what I mean.

Mr. STEVENS. Then the gentleman means that which means nothing; for the Committee of Ways and Means could not pass a law upon that subject. There is an existing law of Congress providing that these expenses shall be met in a certain way; and all that the Committee of Ways and Means had to do was to report an appropriation in accordance with the provision of the law. It was not the province of the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire whether that law was wise or unwise.

Mr. BROOKS. I know that I do not interrupt the gentleman, and therefore I will suggest to him that the committee might simply have added a proviso somewhat in this form: "Provided; That no further sum be appropriated from the Treasury, but that all such collection and safe-keeping, transfer, disbursement, &c., be through the national banks."

Mr. STEVENS. If we had embraced in the bill such a provision, my friend on my right, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] or the gentleman across the way, [Mr. HOLMAN,] would have told us that it was not within our province to report such a provision, for it would alter an existing law. Almost any member would raise that objection. The gentleman, therefore, would have us do what almost every member at all acquainted with the rules of this House knows to be out of order, and knows that we could not do. Now, sir, before a teacher undertakes to instruct his pupils, he had better learn his own lesson; he had better know how to work out the problem before he undertakes to teach its solution to others. The Committee of Ways and Means, therefore, could not have done, in reference to these two items, what the gentleman censures us for not doing. It was not within our power to do so if we had desired to do it.

But, sir, it is said that the Departments were derelict in not making their annual estimates large enough. Mr. Chairman, if they had over-estimated, it would have very well become the Committee of Ways and Means, had they known the fact, to cut down the amounts; but who ever heard of the Committee of Ways and Means being called upon to enlarge the estimates of appropriations? Are we to be censured because last year, when the estimates were sent in to us, we did not say to the Departments, "These estimates ought to be doubled?" that we did not say to the War Department, "You ought to make your estimates $92,000,000 more?" (for that is the deficiency in that Department); that we did not say to the printing department, "You ought to have embraced in your estimates two or three hundred thousand dollars more?" How would that have become the Committee of Ways and Means? And if we had assumed to propose appropriations in excess of the departmental estimates, how long would the gentleman from New York have kept his seat before he would have lectured the Committee of Ways and Means for exceeding in extravagance even the extravagant Departments that had submitted those estimates? Sir, it seems to me that the gentleman's lecture is absurd. In saying this I do not mean any offense; but I think that it is absurd for him to say to us, "You ought last year to have made the appropriations greater," or to say to the Departments that they ought to have made their estimates larger.

Now, sir, it is always better that there should be a deficiency bill than that there should be a large surplus to be expended by the Departments. We meet here now within five months after the termination of the previous session. It was well known that when Congress should meet not half the time for which these appropriations were made would have expired, and that if they should prove insufficient there would be ample time to supply the deficiency by a deficiency bill.

Now, sir, there are always deficiency bills. You can hardly refer to any period in the history of our Government when there were not deficiency bills. It is always better that there should be a necessity for a deficiency bill than that there should be voted upon general estimates a large surplus to be placed at the disposal of the different disbursing officers.

Now, sir, in regard to what is said about these large items. There is a large deficiency in the War Department, I think of $92,000,000. When the different heads of bureaus furnished the estimates for the last annual estimate the Secretary of War cut them down $400,000,000, and reported the balance. We made appropriations for $400,000,000 less than the heads of bureaus reported to be necessary. It turns out that the Secretary of War, without injury to anybody, for there was time to make the appropriation, reported $92,000,000 too little, and when you have made that appropriation in this bill you will fall more than three hundred million dollars under the estimates made by the heads of the different bureaus of the War Department for the last year. What is there here that is wrong? If there be error anywhere it was in the heads of bureaus making their estimates too high. It was wise to cut them down. If they are too low we can remedy that difficulty.

How can the Secretary of War tell how much is necessary when he does not know how many troops will be called into the field, when he does not know how many guns will be lost, when he does not know how many head of cattle will be captured, when he does not know these and many other things? To say that he could foresee them is to induce him with omniscience. No one could do it.

Now as to the deficiency in printing, which is the next large deficiency. Since last year the price of labor has increased less in that department than in any other. I believe the increase has been only twelve and a half per cent. But the price of paper has increased sixty-six per cent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania explain to me his theory in reference to the increase in the price of paper. I understand that we have imposed a duty upon paper so high that none can be imported, and that paper manufacturers have combined to put the price of paper up to this enormous extent, to a price utterly ruinous to the newspaper interest, and which must eventually destroy the local papers in the country unless Congress shall by a joint resolution repeal that duty.

Mr. STEVENS. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that a great deal of fault lies with what I suppose—I do not know the fact—to be a combination among the paper makers. The duty was laid upon paper in hopes of getting some revenue from it. It seems that instead of stimulating that branch of industry, as has been the case with other branches, the reverse has been the case.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to say to my colleague that in a great degree it has stimulated that branch of manufacture, and that at this time works are operating and producing paper for newspapers from wood by a process not known two years ago. There is being erected at this time, to my knowledge, one of the most extensive establishments in the country to produce paper from pulp obtained from wood, and now producing many tons a day from imperfect works.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I should like to inquire of my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] what evidence he has of a combination on the part of paper manufacturers to advance the price of paper. I think, unless he is prepared with facts and statistics, he has no right to present so serious a charge against any branch of industry. I have heard intimations, here and elsewhere, that such was the case, but I have not yet heard any substantial facts which give evidence of any such combination on the part of paper manufacturers.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how this subject has arisen at the present time, as I was called out of the House; but I am prepared to say that to my belief there is no branch of American industry, employing the same amount of capital and labor, that is so unremunerative as the manufacture of paper. A large number of paper mills have been broken down during the past four or five years. If gentlemen would turn their attention to furnishing the manufacturers of paper with the raw material at a less price than they can now obtain it all this difficulty about the price of printing paper would disappear. The fact is that paper manufacturers are not deriving great profits from the manufacture of paper. On the contrary, a large portion of the power employed in making paper in this country has broken down. I could point this House to establishment after establishment that has been broken down because the business has been unremunerative during the last year.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if they have not been broken down by these combinations.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. No, sir. I have no idea the gentleman from Illinois would willingly make any misstatement whatever upon this subject. I have no desire to keep up the price of paper, but I have a desire that this House shall not, by any hasty or unfair legislation, strike a blow at a struggling branch of American industry by destroying the means of producing this article, and by making the burden upon the men employed in making newspaper paper greater than it is now. What will the newspaper interest of this country depend upon if the mills are all broken up? Will they depend upon supplies of paper brought across the Atlantic ocean; and are the members of the American Congress prepared in this time of war to strike down a branch of American industry, and to send this money which is now distributed among our own fellow-citizens across the waters to support the laborers of a foreign and perhaps unfriendly Power?

The whole theory upon this subject is fallacious. It is all wrong. What we want is a greater amount of raw material. No gentleman can say that the employes of these factories receive an unreasonable recompense for their labor without the proprietors of those establishments receive an improper or more than remunerative return. This subject has attracted public attention a great deal within the last few years. Let me illustrate for a moment some of the difficulties which lie in the way of a complete supply of paper. Before the commencement of this war, when cotton was obtainable at a low price, we had a large number of cotton mills running, and they produced a large amount of cotton-waste, and that was the material used for making paper, and, next to rags, was the very best material that could be obtained.

In addition to the raw material, we were deriving from the various States of the Union a large quantity of domestic cotton and linen rags; but the same cause which has wiped out altogether the waste from cotton factories, so that there is no raw material from that source for paper, has also led the people of the country to practice unusual economy in the use of their cotton clothing, and they mend up and make it last as long as possible, so that a very large portion of the supply of domestic rags has also been taken away from the paper manufacturers.

We are then producing less raw material than we were before the war. We have a large number of men, formerly clothed more or less in cotton, who are now clothed entirely in wool, and they make no rags for the paper maker's use.

We are now dependent largely upon foreign markets for rags, and since the stringency came upon the American manufacturer for his raw material, every device has been resorted to to supply the deficiency. The result is that great progress has been made in working straw and wood, and I think there is now every prospect that within a very short time—within a few years, and probably within a few months—there will be a very considerable accession to the raw material for paper making from straw and from wood. But if Congress is going to so legislate as to destroy this branch of American industry, there will be no American capitalists, no American manufacturers, who will risk their capital and direct their enterprise to this unpromising, and indeed ruinous, branch of business.

I hope there will be no modification whatever of the tariff on paper; and if there shall be any reduction of the tariff on imported paper, I hope Congress will at least make a corresponding reduction in the internal duty imposed upon that article. I believe that the true way to a reduction of the price of paper, and an abundant supply, is for Congress to turn its attention to the development of this branch of manufacture at home, and particularly in the western country, where the raw material is so much more abundant than it is at the East. I have no interests in this question which are subserved by a high duty on foreign paper, and I am entirely willing to give whatever influence I have in the direction of securing to the consumers of paper an abundant and cheap supply. And the way to do that is to protect the interests of our own manufacturers at home.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In making the inquiry I did of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means I had no idea of being precipitated into a discussion of this paper question; and I had no idea of waking up my friend from Massachusetts, of whose politeness I have been the recipient at Boston, in looking through his magnificent paper warehouse in that beautiful city. My idea was—and I think it is one which has pervaded this House to a very considerable extent—that the price of paper had risen to such an extent that it was impossible for the country to live under it, in consequence of the imposition of the present tariff, which is prohibitory. That leaves it to the domestic manufacturers; and I have understood from the best authorities that there is a combination of paper makers who have controlled this whole matter and who have brought up the price of paper from twelve and fifteen cents a pound to twenty-five and twenty-six cents per pound. That there has been such an advance in price I presume the gentleman will not deny.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask my friend a question if he will permit me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. If he will answer my question satisfactorily with his own theory, perhaps we shall get some light on this subject. If he knows anything about the manufacturing of paper he knows this, that it takes two pounds of rags to make one pound of paper. He knows also that the paper manufacturer is dependent upon the foreign article, and he knows also that such is the price of exchange that it now costs more than twice as much to obtain a pound of the foreign article that it did before the war. How can it possibly be, then, that two pounds of rags, costing twice as much as they did before the war, can be made into paper now and the paper cost less than twice as much as it did before the war? You must also put into the computation the fact that there is a large amount of chemicals entering into the manufacture of paper that are bought abroad at the same double price, and more too, from the necessity growing out of the cost of exchange.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] hit this matter precisely. The discovery of new materials here at home from which the manufacture of paper is being successfully carried on is a means whereby the price of paper will be brought down here at home; but never can it be manufactured at a less rate than double what it could be manufactured for before the war so long as you have to give two dollars for one for all the rags you bring into this country, and so long as the circumstances alluded to by my colleague [Mr. RICE] are such that we are dependent on foreign rags for this manufacture. It cannot be otherwise, unless my friend has genius enough to explain how it can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes occasion to state two things: first, that the interruptions of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and other gentlemen are coming out of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]; and further, the Chair will be compelled, if it assumes a much wider range, to arrest the whole of this debate upon the ground that in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all debate on a special order must be confined strictly to the measure under consideration. This being an appropriation for the purchase of stationery, it is scarcely competent to go into the question of the duty on paper.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No question of order of that kind has been raised.

The CHAIRMAN. No, but the Chair will feel compelled to raise that point of order from the chair if the debate takes a much wider range. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will try to keep within the rules.

In regard to the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], in relation to the enhanced price of the material from which paper is manufactured, let me say this in reply: before the war, the price of paper was eight and nine cents a pound, and the enhanced price of the material would have brought it up, say to fifteen or sixteen cents a pound; but not being satisfied with that, these paper monopolists and manufacturers have run it up to twenty-five and twenty-seven cents per pound.

The gentleman from the Boston district [Mr. RICE] spoke of the hardship and injury suffered by the paper manufacturers, and their failure to make money at the present prices. Let me tell him some facts which I know of my own knowledge. There is a paper-mill in the State of Illinois, half of which was proposed to be sold six months ago for $15,000, and the party now asks $75,000, and says that at that price it will pay an interest of forty per cent.

This question does not come before us here because this is an appropriation which we are bound to make for this deficiency arising from the enhanced price of paper. I understand from the Superintendent of Public Printing—and if I am wrong the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will correct me—that he made his estimate at eighteen cents per pound, but instead of paying eighteen cents per pound he is obliged by these enhanced prices to pay from thirty-one to thirty-seven cents per pound. But we have got to meet this question.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I would like to ask my friend from Illinois whether the law does not require that the Superintendent of Public Printing shall advertise for proposals for paper, and whether his contracts are not based upon the returns made to that advertisement; and if so, and if he entered into contracts for paper at eighteen cents a pound; I would like to know where is his authority for paying thirty cents a pound?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman does not understand me as saying that the Superintendent entered into contracts at that rate. I said he made his estimates at that rate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. He made the estimates on which I suppose he would have to base his contracts.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I should suppose that the Superintendent of Public Printing, whose business it is to be acquainted with the price of paper, would come nearer to the mark than estimating paper at eighteen cents and paying for it over thirty cents.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That has nothing to do with the great fact that the Superintendent of Public Printing, who has full knowledge of the matter, instead of buying paper at eighteen cents a pound, which he estimated as a fair price, states to the Committee of Ways and Means that he is obliged to pay from thirty-one to thirty-seven cents a pound. That has nothing to do with the law in regard to the contract system. We have got to meet this question, not here in this deficiency bill, but when it shall come before the House. Then it will be for Representatives to say whether the country shall have to submit to the present high price of paper by continuing the high prohibitory duty, thus imposing a tax upon education, a tax upon knowledge, a tax upon newspapers, a tax which will, in fact, destroy all our local newspapers if it be continued.

Mr. MORRILL. May I be allowed to ask the gentleman from Illinois, as he has spoken of the high tariff on paper, what that tariff is?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. It is prohibitory.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is high enough to prevent the importation of paper. I think it is twenty per cent., payable, as a matter of course, in gold.

Mr. COX. I think I can answer that question.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not ask the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I am very sorry to have to cut off this debate.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEVENS. If my time on this floor were not very short, Mr. Chairman, I might; but, as it is, I must be excused. I am very glad that this debate has sprung up, because it has given us information which may be of use hereafter. Now, however, we are dealing only with this bill; and the actual price of paper is what we have to consider, not as to how we shall reduce the price hereafter, as I hope we shall do. At present, however, its increased price has caused this deficiency, and makes an appropriation necessary. That is why it is in this bill.

There is another item of some ninety millions for the ordnance department. That arises from the fact that it is impossible to tell in advance what forts may be finished and will need armament. As works have been finished ordnance has been supplied, and that has caused the deficiency now asked for. As we have discussed the whole bill without any particular objection to any part of it, I hope we will go on and pass it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, as the subject has come up for discussion, I desire to say, upon the paper question, that it is not entirely in consequence of the increased price of paper that this large deficiency has occurred. A very considerable part of the blame is to be put upon this House. Whenever the question of printing arises we find the gentlemen on the other side as well as on this side of the Chamber ready to make the largest appropriations asked for. At the last session I endeavored on two or three occasions to arrest this, but without avail. One proposition came in to print two hundred and fifty thousand extra copies of the report on agriculture, which required the work to be reprinted; and although the usual number of extra copies had been already distributed that proposition passed the House.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I wish to say that the printing ordered by the House is but a small item of the expense. The great mass of public printing is done for the Departments.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not wish to censure the gentlemen who are on the Committee on Public Printing so much as the action of the House, if I may be allowed to express myself in that way.

Mr. STEVENS. I think I must call the gentleman to order.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the remark.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman, coming from a little stony hill in Vermont, which cannot be plowed, and which is not capable of agricultural development, is always attacking this agricultural report. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to concede that the work itself is perhaps one which we ought to publish, and of which we ought to publish a liberal number.

Then there was another proposition, and that was to print ten thousand extra copies of the volume from the Secretary of State. That passed. Subsequently there was another proposition—to print the Dictionary of Congress; and every gentleman who wished to see his name in print of course supported that, although the work had no more to do with our legislative business than Worcester's or Webster's Dictionary.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he voted for that proposition.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not.

Mr. WILSON. Well, very many others did.

Mr. MORRILL. But, Mr. Chairman, there are evils in the establishment of this office. It enables all the Departments of the Government to go there whenever they are hungry. Whenever they want a little job all they have to do is to make an order for it, and it is done. We strove at the last session to regulate that somewhat by providing that nothing should be printed except under the order of the chief of a Department. It does happen to be true that a large amount of printing is required for the War Office, a much larger amount than was anticipated. The whole of this increase has not arisen in consequence of the rise in the price of paper. It has arisen in part from the increased amount of orders for printing, mainly from the War Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the item extending from the one hundred and second to the one hundred and eleventh line of the bill, I raise the point of order, under the 120th rule of the House, that the appropriation is not authorized by any existing law. I regret to be obliged to raise this point, because the appropriation applies to a very meritorious class of gentlemen connected with this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the clause which is objected to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employes, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for that purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will also read the 120th rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objects to the clause of the bill which has been read, providing for increasing by twenty per cent. the compensation of the officers, clerks, and other employes of this House.

The Chair overrules the point of order, as made under the provisions of the 120th rule, for this reason: The House of Representatives is a portion of one of the departments of the Government. The pay of its officers, clerks, and other employes, is a contingency attending the carrying on of that department of the Government. A question whether, in order to carry on the department, greater remuneration is necessary in order to secure the continued service of these employes or to properly compensate them, is a question which relates to the carrying on of that department. The last clause of the 120th rule is in these terms:

"Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

The Chair decides that it is a contingency relating to carrying on the legislative department of the Government, if the House thinks proper and the Senate thinks proper to increase the remuneration of their servants in order to secure their services, or in order better to reward those services.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the general debate on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 620, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS moved that when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed the consideration of the bill, all general debate should be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the deficiency bill, on which further general debate had been limited to one minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the attention of the committee to the following:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employes, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for that purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether that increase of twenty per cent. embraces the Commissioner of Public Buildings and the officers under him.

Mr. STEVENS. My recollection is that the police under him are embraced, but that the Commissioner himself is not.

Mr. HOLMAN. His salary is $2,000.

Mr. STEVENS. He is not embraced.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have the original resolution read, to see how broad it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to get the matter before the committee, I move to strike out these words:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employes, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for that purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

I ask that the Clerk will read the resolution of July 4, 1864; but before it is read I desire to say that I am well aware of the faithfulness in the discharge of their duties of the class of officers designated in this appropriation. They are a meritorious class of our citizens. The salary paid to them is equal to that paid in the other departments of the Government, and equal to that heretofore paid to like servants of the country. It is equal to that paid to other officers in various employments under the Government. It seems to me, then, that this House ought not to favor its own particular employes by increasing their salaries at a time when economy is demanded.

I appeal to the House. Here is an appropriation bill of $93,000,000 to supply a deficit for the present fiscal year ending the 30th of June next. It also contains a proposition to increase the salaries of a large class of officers to the extent of over thirty-seven thousand dollars. I do insist, Mr. Chairman, that we are not sufficiently mindful as a body, although we may be as members, of the condition of the country in reference to that most material feature, its finances. We have a tremendous war upon us demanding the whole resources of the country, and it does seem to me that we should husband those resources, and that there should, if possible, be retrenchment of extravagant and unnecessary expenses in all departments of the public service. We ought not certainly to increase expenditures in departments having no connection with the war whatever. So far as the War and Navy Departments are concerned, I have not raised my voice against appropriations for them. What I condemn, and what I protest against, is the enormous increase made during the last four years in those departments of the Government not at all affected by the ravages and operations of war.

I now ask for the reading of the resolution which was adopted on the 4th of July last when scarcely any members were present. There was no dissenting voice at the time, and I presume only a few were aware of its passage.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk pay, at the close of this session, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the officers, clerks, and other employes of the House, a sum equal to twenty per cent. of their annual compensation respectively; or, where not receiving an annual compensation, on the amount received by them during the session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. From the reading of that resolution it will be perceived that it differs from this clause in the bill in this, that while the resolution provides for paying the clerks, officers, and other employes of the House, the bill provides also for paying the additional compensation to the reporters of the House for the Congressional Globe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is another resolution which embraced them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear that resolution read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk pay out of the contingent fund to the reporters of the House for the Congressional Globe an amount equal to twenty per cent. of their compensation as such reporters, for the present session of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the others go in I certainly shall not object to including the reporters for the Globe; but I wish to call the attention of the House to the original resolution, and to the section of the bill now under consideration, and, to prevent the possibility of any other payments being made, I ask the gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] to consent to an amendment of the clause, by adding thereto the following:

But no payment shall be made under this provision to any other persons than the officers, clerks, and other employes of the House, and the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the appropriation is intended to embrace none other than those enumerated in the two resolutions which have been read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman object to my amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does that amendment exclude the Capitol police?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am opposed to the amendment, simply because it does not amount to anything at all. The same construction will be placed upon the gentleman's amendment that is placed upon the original proposition. The amendment uses the words "other employes of the House;" and that is the precise language of the appropriation. The Capitol police on this side of the Capitol have always been considered employes of the House; and the Senate make appropriations of extra compensation for the Capitol police employed at that end of the Capitol.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman certainly must be mistaken. I have never heard that they were considered as being employes of the House, or that they have received the extra compensation which has usually been voted to the employes of the House. Yet I want this amendment adopted, so that it will exclude them from the benefit of the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Who, then, will be embraced besides the officers, clerks, doorkeepers, and other officers immediately connected with the House? Who are meant by "employes?" Who are the employes who are to be paid? Probably the gentleman from Illinois can tell.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion to strike out the appropriation was not agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. For the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the amount of money we are appropriating for furnishing the Treasury Department, I move to amend by striking out lines sixty-six and sixty-seven, as follows:

For furniture, carpets, and miscellaneous items for the Treasury building, $15,000.

If gentlemen will look at last year's deficiency bill, they will see that they appropriated, for furniture, carpets, and miscellaneous items for the Treasury building, $25,000; and immediately below, for furniture, repairs of furniture in the Treasury Department, $5,000. There is $30,000. Then they will find in the same bill an appropriation for refunding to the appropriation for the Treasury extension the amount paid out of that appropriation of $150,000 for similar purposes. So that in last year's deficiency bill we appropriated absolutely $30,000, and so much of the $150,000 as was used. And in the regular appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1865, we appropriated for the same purpose $40,000; and now in this bill we appropriate the amounts I have alluded to, the $15,000, and in the clause before that, $16,911 53, for refunding to the Treasury extension the amount of payments made for furniture, and, on the first page, $5,000 more for furniture, carpeting, preserving files, and miscellaneous items in the office of the Third Auditor; making in this bill $36,911 53.

So it appears that at the last session and this we appropriated for furnishing this building $106,900 in addition to what was paid out of the $150,000. It does seem to me, considering that it was a building pretty well furnished before we came into office, that the appropriation of last session of over $70,000 specifically, in addition to what was paid out of the $150,000, and that of $36,900 now, is too much.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, all the members of this House know that we have gone on furnishing room after room in the Treasury building as fast as they were finished. The furniture has been necessary in order to enable the clerks to occupy the rooms. Since our meeting here last year, many of these rooms have been completed, and of course new furniture has been necessary. I presume there has not been an article bought that was not necessary to furnish some of these new rooms so as to enable the clerks to occupy them and go on with their business.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the following clause:

For salary of the commissioner for codifying the naval laws under joint resolution of March 3, 1863, from July 1, 1864, to March 3, 1865, $2,025.

I call the attention of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to that item. It contains an appropriation for the salary of the commissioner for codifying the naval laws. As I understood it, that commissioner made his report at the last session of Congress and prior to the 1st day of July last. What he has had to do since I know not. There was nothing in the tenor of his appointment or the duties with which he was charged which should call upon us to pay him any salary after he made his report.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I have seen the commissioner and he tells me that he has been busily engaged ever since the adjournment of Congress in the revision of his report, and expects to be so engaged until the end of the fiscal year, when he hopes to have it completed. He had but partially finished it, and he states that the work he has been doing since was necessary to make it perfect, and that he has been constantly engaged upon it.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 620,) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had directed him to report the same to the House, with an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON GAS COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 363, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage. It is a bill for the relief of the Gas Company of the city of Washington.

Mr. PIKE. I object.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. STROUSE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of amending section one hundred and three of the internal revenue act, so that canal boats and barges now paying a tonnage tax shall be exempt from the tax of two and a half per cent. upon freight, &c., and be thus placed upon the same footing as provincial vessels bringing cargoes to our ports.

NORTHERN INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to abolish the northern Indian superintendency; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONFISCATION OF CONSCRIPTS' PROPERTY.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report at an early day upon the expediency of a law to confiscate for the Government, when practicable, so much of the property of conscripts who have failed to report for duty as may be required to secure the services of a soldier in their stead.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

THE NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize national banks to close their banking institutions on certain days named, and to make all notes and other negotiable instruments, under the laws of the United States, falling due and payable on such days, due and payable on the preceding secular day respectively; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of July 1, 1864, regulating the compensation of postmasters, as to allow postmasters of the third class a reasonable sum for the necessary cost of rent, fuel, lights, and clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

MILITARY ROAD IN ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of making a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of a military road from the head of navigation on the Colorado river to Great Salt Lake City, and from some point on the said river to Prescott, the capital of Arizona; and also as to the propriety of an appropriation of lands for the improvement of the navigation of Colorado river.

FRIENDLY INDIANS OF ARIZONA.

Mr. POSTON also, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose of colonizing the friendly Indians of Arizona on a reservation to be selected from the public lands.

TAX ON MILEAGE.

Mr. DRIGGS asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas the Sergeant-at-Arms has deducted the five per cent. tax from the mileage of members as well as from the salary: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire by what authority the same has been done, and to report to this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; when the Speaker signed the same.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained, from the fact that the House has already decided that it will not meet on Friday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I ask unanimous consent that there shall be no business transacted to-morrow.

Objection was made.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at twenty-five minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 22, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I present the petition of William Appelman, of Pennsylvania, with accompanying papers, reciting his conviction before a military commission, and praying that the fine imposed by it may be refunded. I move that the petition and papers be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to printing solely on the ground that I hear no statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania that will make this an exception to the general rule, which is that petitions shall not be printed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection to waive the motion to print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print is waived, and the petition lies on the table.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and a report from the Light-House Board, upon a petition of citizens of Rhode Island and New York, praying for the establishment of fog signals at Point Judith, Rhode Island, and at Execution Rocks, and Hart Island, New York. The subject is of public interest, and I move that the letter and the report be read and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to; and the following documents were read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 20, 1864.

SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant, with accompanying petitions from citizens of Providence, Rhode Island, and New York, engaged in commercial pursuits in said cities, requesting the erection of "fog signals" at Point Judith, Execution Rocks, Hart Island, and Beaver Tail, having been referred to the Light-House Board, I have the honor to transmit a copy of their report on the subject.

I am, very respectfully,

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. WILLIAM SPRAGUE, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

OFFICE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD, December 19, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, with a petition from citizens of Providence, Rhode Island, and New York, engaged in commercial pursuits in said cities, also addressed to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, and both addressed to this board "for a report."

These papers have been submitted to the board, and I am instructed respectfully to report that the attention of the board has been anxiously drawn to the subject of ear signals of different kinds as aids to navigation in those waters of the bays and rivers of the United States where fogs most prevail.

In 1860 an appropriation of $6,000 was made by Congress to enable the board to experiment in the matter of fog signals. Of this appropriation $4,500 are yet on hand, and further experiments are necessary to enable the board to decide on the relative advantages of bells, whistles, and trumpets. It has been deemed that the excellent light on Point Judith and the large buoy on the Great Eastern Rock were sufficient for vessels entering or leaving the waters of the United States by that passage, but a bell or whistle will be immediately placed near the light if an appropriation can be obtained in accordance with an estimate submitted with this.

The fog signal at Beaver Tail was discontinued temporarily, but will again be put in operation.

The bell on Execution Rocks has been ordered to be replaced by a larger one.

Measures are being taken for the erection of a light-house on Hart Island, and a fog signal, either a bell or whistle, will be placed there.

The papers are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

W. B. SHUBRICK, Chairman.

HON. WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN, Secretary of the Treasury.

Estimate.

For fog signals at Point Judith, Rhode Island, Execution Rocks and Hart Island, New York, $10,000.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition from Rev. John Beeson, who is well known to have interested himself very much in the welfare of the Indians, in which he asks Congress that a proclamation of amnesty and protection for all Indians who will cease their hostility against the people and Government of the United States may be speedily issued. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of Mrs. Catharine Spear, widow of the late Rev. Charles Spear, who devoted his life to persons in prison, asking Congress to make provision for the care and reformation of juvenile offenders here in the District of Columbia, and setting forth the necessity of such provision. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of officers of the Army praying for an increase of their pay and allowances; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 586) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers, reported adversely thereon, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred two petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying for the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

THE SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the relief to soldiers at the Soldiers' Home, inquiring into the manner in which the funds for the said institution have been managed, the present condition of the same, and also whether the benevolent purposes of the Government in establishing the same might not be better carried out by repealing the law, abandoning that mode of relief, and substituting therefor pensions to those at present by law entitled to its benefits.

Mr. HALE. My impression is that a resolution of this kind, and perhaps in these very words, was passed at the last session; but I have no objection to this resolution; let it go.

The resolution was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862. The bill proposes to amend the section referred to, so as to make it read as follows:

That any alien, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has enlisted or shall enlist in the armies of the United States, either the volunteer or regular forces, or in the naval or marine forces, and has been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and that the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to the proof of residence and good moral character, as is now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States as aforesaid.

Mr. WILSON. I do not desire to put the bill on its passage now, but to move two sections as amendments to it, in order to have them printed. I do not think there will be any objection to them; but I wish Senators to have them before them, so that they may know what they are. The amendments are to add to the bill the following additional sections:

SEC. 1. And be it further enacted, That it is not within the intent of the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to authorize the brevetting of volunteer and other officers in the United States service," authorizing the President to confer brevet rank for gallant actions and meritorious conduct, to make a distinction as to pay between the officers of volunteers and other forces, including the regular Army; but that such brevet rank does not entitle any officer, either of the regular Army or volunteers, to any increase of pay or emoluments.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if a soldier discharged for wounds received in battle die before receiving the bounty provided by the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the employment of volunteers," &c., the bounty due shall descend to his heirs in the same manner and order of succession as if he had died in service.

The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 363) to incorporate the Association of the Sisters of Mercy in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LAND SALES IN KANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 88) suspending the sale by sealed bids of the lands of the Kansas and the Sac and Fox Indians; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the joint resolution on its passage at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to postpone the sales of the lands of the Kansas and Sac and Fox tribes of Indians of the State of Kansas by sealed bids until the 14th of December, 1865, any treaty or law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HARLAN. Has that resolution been reported from any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not. It has just been introduced by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is a copy of a resolution that was passed on the same subject at the second session of a former Congress. I desire to state to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands that these lands were advertised while our people were engaged in resisting Price's invasion of the State. To-morrow is the day appointed for the opening of the bids, and unless the sale is postponed our people will have had no opportunity whatever of competing for the lands. The sales were postponed on the last day of the session of 1862, and this is an exact copy of that resolution. To-morrow is the termination of the period when the bids are to be opened, and unless this resolution is passed, the lands will all go into the hands of speculators, our people not having had an opportunity of bidding for them.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I prefer that the resolution should be passed over for a few moments until we can look into it a little.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no objection to its being passed over for a few moments, but I am very anxious that it should be passed to-day.

Mr. HARLAN. It is not my purpose to defer action to-day, but I learn from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that he has not been consulted in relation to it, and I have not, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and I would prefer to look into it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In explanation, I will state that I have just this moment returned from the Interior Department, and have just learned that to-morrow is the last day. The former resolution to which I have referred, and of which this is an exact copy, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and reported by that committee. You will find it the very last act of the second session of the former Congress. I have just sent for the statute. The sales were then postponed for the same reason: the people of Kansas had had no opportunity to bid; and I ask a postponement now for the same reason. They were advertised for three weeks.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the honorable Senator from Kansas whether the Department of the Interior recommends the suspension.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I copied this resolution in Judge Usher's room.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We will look into it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Do I understand the Senator to object to it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let it lie over for a short time. The other Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] has just taken his seat, and I should like to consult with him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid aside informally.

DELAWARE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether volunteers for thirty days and for one hundred days were called for by order of his Department, at any time preceding the last two drafts in the State of Delaware, from that State, and if so, for what purpose, and under what authority of law; whether such volunteers were promised as an inducement to volunteer exemption from said drafts; whether said volunteers were exempted from said drafts when they volunteered; whether they were kept within the limits of said State, and whether they were promised as a further inducement to volunteer that they should not be sent without the limits of said State, or that they should not be employed in active service in the field.

OATH FOR LAWYERS.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 72.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, which had been reported upon adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary. It provides that no person, after the date of this act, shall be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, or of any circuit or district court of the United States, or of the Court of Claims, as an attorney or counselor of such court, or shall be allowed to appear and be heard in any such court, by virtue of any previous admission or any special power of attorney, unless he shall have first taken and subscribed the oath prescribed in "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, according to the forms and in the manner provided in that act; which oath so taken and subscribed is to be preserved among the files of such court, and any person who shall falsely take the oath shall be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction, shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury, and the additional pains and penalties in that act provided.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not rise to oppose the passage of the bill, but to suggest to the honorable member from Massachusetts that perhaps it would be as well to make it operate at some future day. It applies to all circuit and district courts of the United States; and between now and the time when the courts will know of the existence of such a law, there will be hundreds, perhaps, of lawyers admitted. It does not require those who have been admitted to take the oath. I think the bill had better be limited to some future day.

Mr. SUMNER. What day would the Senator propose?

Mr. JOHNSON. Any day that would give sufficient time to enable the courts to have a knowledge of the existence of this law.

Mr. SUMNER. How would it do to say, "so soon as the law shall reach them?"

Mr. JOHNSON. Then you would make it a matter of fact, you know. I suggest the 1st of February. That will be time enough.

Mr. SUMNER. By the telegraph the knowledge can come to any court now in twenty-four hours.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I were the court I would not be governed by telegraphic dispatches in these times; you cannot rely upon them; and some of these courts are situated where there is no telegraph.

Mr. SUMNER. Not United States courts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh yes. There are all the United States courts in the Territories. I suggest the 1st of February.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have it act immediately in this capital.

Mr. JOHNSON. You can say it shall act in the Supreme Court now, and in the other courts of the United States on and after the 1st of February or the 4th of March.

The honorable member from Massachusetts yesterday—I did not hear him at the time very distinctly—referring to the bill which is now before the Senate, and which he said was at that time on the table, stated that he understood some lawyers had refused to take a similar oath prescribed by the local courts. I know of but one member of the bar who is in that situation; and it is due to him to say, (and I am sure the honorable member from Massachusetts will agree that the reason assigned was sufficient,) that he had no objection at all to take the oath if it was legally exacted, but he objected to its being administered by the mere order of the supreme court for this District, he thinking (whether he was right or not, I am not prepared to say) that as the law creating the court as it now exists transferred all the causes to the new court from the old, the lawyers who were concerned in the old court, and entitled to try those causes, were necessarily also entitled to appear in the new court without taking the oath, as Congress had provided no law to the contrary. I am satisfied from what I heard him say long before the bill was introduced by the honorable member from Massachusetts, and what I have heard him say still more recently, that he never had or would have the slightest objection to take the oath when the oath should be prescribed by any law passed by Congress. And, as far as I am advised, speaking for the profession generally, I do not know that there is a member of the bar in the United States who will hesitate to take this oath after Congress shall have passed the law.

But my principal object in rising was to suggest to the honorable member the propriety of extending the operation of this bill, at least in relation to the other courts, to some distant day when all the courts can have knowledge of its existence, so that the rule upon the subject may be uniform.

Mr. SUMNER. I accept the suggestion of the Senator, and move to insert after the word "or," in the fourth line, the words "at any time after the 4th of March next shall be admitted to the bar;" so that the whole clause will read:

That no person, after the date of this act, shall be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, or at any time after the 4th of March next shall be admitted to the bar of any circuit or district court of the United States, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. That satisfies me.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I feel a very great indifference about this matter, whether it passes or fails; but I suppose it will pass as a matter of course. My own experience is that official oaths are of very little value; and I do not think they are of any more value upon the parties who propose them than they are upon those whom it is intended should take them. This seems to be the day of imposing oaths. We have test oaths and special oaths and general oaths connected with office and official duty without number. For myself, with some experience in relation to the value of oaths, I would not give a fig for all that could be imposed in connection with the performance of official duties. I think it is trifling with and bringing into contempt, if not derision, what was intended to be a very sacred and solemn obligation, and that one effort will be to deprive it of all of its moral power, in a great degree at least.

But there is one special objection which I would suggest to this measure. I care not whether it passes or not. I understand that lawyers and practitioners in the courts of the British provinces are permitted to practice in the courts of some of the adjacent States and in some of the United States courts held in those States, and that this is a matter of mutual comity. I do not know personally that such is the fact, but from all the information I have received on that point, I believe it to be so; and I think this comity would be unnecessarily and without the least profit in any consideration whatever interfered with by the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was one of the members of this body who thought the Congress of the United States had not the authority constitutionally to pass the act indicated in this bill. I thought it was ex post facto in some, and in my judgment objectionable in all, of its provisions. I believe if there is one evil more than another in this country, it is the administering of these oaths so freely. Go back a few years ago, and you find that political societies were organized throughout the length and breadth of this land bound together by secret oaths taken at midnight, in out-of-the-way places sometimes. I think you can trace from the experience of that day some of the evil consequences which afflict us now. I believe that a measure of this kind can be attended with no possible good.

I will not, however, Mr. President, discuss the question. My purpose in rising was simply to call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, so that I might record my vote against a measure of this character. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called) said: I suppose I am at liberty to say a word before voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. This bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session; and it was, I think, the almost unanimous opinion of the committee that it was not at all necessary to the security of the country that this oath should be required to be prescribed, and they therefore failed to recommend the passage of the bill. We were under the impression, as well as I remember, that if it was necessary to prescribe such an oath to members of the bar, it was equally necessary, and perhaps more necessary, (because the members of the bar, comparatively, in numbers, are very small with reference to the whole population of the United States who are concerned in business of various descriptions,) that it should be prescribed to every man in the United States; not only to any man who pursues any other profession, but any man who pursues any calling. The doctor should not be permitted to practice unless he took an oath of this description; the clergyman should not be permitted to preach unless he took an oath of this description; the merchant should not be permitted to carry on his particular business; and so in reference to all the relations in which men may be placed in society. But as the honorable member seems to think that it may in some measure serve to render the condition of the country more safe or less perilous than it would be without this oath being taken by the members of the bar, I for one am willing to let him silence his own fears on that subject and let the law be passed. I say, "Yea."

The call of the roll was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 27, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Richardson, and Salisbury—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Cowan, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—18.

So the bill was passed.

LAND SALES IN KANSAS.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution offered by my colleague, that was laid aside informally so that we might examine the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of that joint resolution, (S. No. 88,) it having been laid aside informally.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "14th day of December" and inserting "1st day of July."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I accept that amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I will only remark to the Senate that I have had my attention called to the treaty this morning, and I do not see that the lands can be sold at less than $1 25 an acre; but being informed that there is an effort to get the lands into the hands of speculators and not settlers, I desire to have the matter postponed for six months, so as to give every body a fair opportunity. I do not think that can work any injury, but it may work some good to our citizens. I do not think it is good policy to prevent the people getting their titles at an early day, because until the titles are perfected the people will not improve, and the country will not settle up. I want the titles perfected at an early day, and that is the reason why I propose a postponement of six months instead of a year. I think a delay of six months will give any contesting parties time enough to prove their claims and perfect their titles. I cannot see, however, that any injury could result if the provisions of the treaty were adhered to strictly; but to prevent anything of that kind I am willing to vote for the passage of the resolution with this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] accepts the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. POMEROY,] and the resolution will be regarded as so modified.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This question in 1862 was before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and at that time we recommended the passage of a similar resolution. I do not from any knowledge which has come to me know that it can in any way prejudice the interests of the tribe of Indians; and as both the Senators from Kansas concur in the resolution and desire its passage, and I suppose as a matter of course they represent, and properly represent, the interests of the people of Kansas, and I do not know of any objection to the passage of the resolution, I shall vote for it. It came up suddenly, and being asked to be passed immediately without reference to a committee, I was cautious upon that subject and desired some little examination of it. With my present information, unless in the course of the day some further information should come to me, I shall consent now that the resolution may be taken up and passed; but if any further information shall come to me showing that, in my judgment, the resolution ought not to have been passed, I shall reserve to myself the right to move a reconsideration.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the special order, which is the Senate joint resolution No. 82.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the House joint resolution No. 121.

Mr. GRIMES. What is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution proposed to be taken up is a joint resolution (H. R. No. 121) granting additional compensation to the employés of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. The resolution that I desire now to call up is only in reference to the employés of the two Houses of Congress. I will state for the information of the Senator from Iowa that I do not desire now to press the consideration of the resolution against the views of the Senate, but I am very well satisfied that something in some cases ought to be done. I am very well satisfied that additional compensation in some cases ought to be allowed, and the Senator, I apprehend, will agree with me in that. If, when the resolution is called up, as I believe it has not ever been sent to a committee, if it be desired by the Senator from Iowa or any other Senator to take that course, and to send it to a committee for examination, and to include other employés of the Government in regard to whom it is absolutely essential that something should be done, I shall have no objection to that course. I am satisfied that additional compensation in some cases, not only here but in the Departments, will have to be allowed. The Secretary of the Treasury calls attention to the fact, and I think the time has come when we must all admit that some additional compensation should be allowed in some cases, and therefore we had better either take up the resolution and perfect it here, or else send it to a committee and let it be examined. I have no objection to either course.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no objection to the joint resolution being taken up if the purpose the Senator desires to accomplish is to refer it to a committee for examination, but I am opposed to taking it up for consideration by the Senate with a view to pass it at this time. If the purpose of the Senator is to refer it to a committee, I have no objection to its being taken up; but this question of increasing compensation is a very broad one; and if we begin it in one Department, or with one man, it will have to run through all the employés of the Government. It ought to begin with the men in the field, with the soldiers and the sailors, and not with the men who are here receiving ten times their compensation as employés about the Capitol; and I prefer to see this subject, if it is to be touched at all, brought to the attention of the Senate from the committees representing the Army and Navy rather than from those that represent the personal friends of the Senators.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to know whether it is proposed to take up the resolution for action by the body, or merely for the purpose of reference.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to call up the resolution for consideration now, but if the Senator from Iowa, or any other Senator, desires to refer it to a committee I shall make no opposition to that course being taken.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to taking up the resolution for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Iowa, but I am opposed to direct action on it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the special order of the day, with a view of taking up the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House joint resolution is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

The bill was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FREEDOM OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, (after a pause.) There seems to be no business before the Senate, and I believe there was a sort of tacit understanding that no business of importance should be done to-day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator withdraw that motion to allow a joint resolution to be taken up, which was just now laid aside, so that it may not lose its place?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly. If there is any business that we can properly do now, let it be done.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate stands adjourned to meet on Thursday, the 5th day of January next, at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 22, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the number and names of persons employed in the coast survey during the last fiscal year; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EUROPEAN IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 20th instant, the report made by Chief Engineer J. W. King, in relation to the iron-clad vessels and dock-yards of Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LAWS OF DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The Speaker also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the laws of the Territory of Dakota; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

TRADE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, the report of Major General E. R. C. Canby, commanding the military division of Western Mississippi, concerning the purchase by the United States of products of States declared to be in insurrection.

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, obtained the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a privileged question. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] cannot move a call of the House while the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is on the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the bill for the creation of a Board of Admiralty, which has been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, be printed for the information of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LAW. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must object until it be ascertained whether a quorum is present. When the House determined to adjourn to-day for two weeks, it did not mean that it should adjourn yesterday. I insist that we shall not do business here without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects; therefore the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAW] cannot be received.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, unless there is a motion pending, I ask leave to offer the following resolution—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] desires to submit some remarks. I hope that my friend from Illinois will not press his objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not ask any action upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do. We have no right to do business without a quorum.

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which they requested the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 367) to repeal the provision of the law requiring certain regents in the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute.

ADJOURNMENT—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] moves to adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move a call of the House, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 70, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Cole, Eckley, Farnsworth, John H. Hubbard, Amos Myers, Orth, Pike, Scofield, Spalding, Stevens, Williams, and Worthington—13.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eden, Eldridge, Eliot, Frank, Grider, Hale, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Law, Le Blond, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Shannon, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Whaley, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Yeaman—70.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Arnold, Blaine, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, William G. Steele, Stiles, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—99.

During the call,

Mr. ORTH stated that his colleague, Mr. JULIAN, was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. HIGBY stated that Mr. WOODBRIDGE was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, made a similar statement in reference to Mr. ALLISON.

When the result of the vote had been announced,

Mr. FARNSWORTH said: Mr. Speaker, is there a quorum?

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not in attendance.

Mr. STEVENS rose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. FARNSWORTH. No quorum appeared on the last vote, and business is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. No quorum being present arrests business.

Mr. CRAVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn, there being, on a division—yeas 37, nays 39.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call of the House has not been received generally, although under the strict language of the rule it may be; for under the rules a motion for a call of the House may be renewed, like a motion to adjourn, after other business has transpired.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw my motion, and move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is apparent that we can do no business, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Arnold, Blaine, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Fenton, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Sloan, Smith, William G. Steele, Stiles, Thayer, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge.

Mr. BEAMAN moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, stated that his colleague, Mr. ALLISON, was detained from the House by illness.

The SPEAKER announced that eighty-nine members had answered to their names, three less than a quorum.

Mr. STEVENS. Probably we shall not be able to get a quorum to-day. It does seem unkind, after we have granted so liberal an adjournment of two weeks for the holidays, that gentlemen should not stay here, and that we should thus lose one more day. But I do not see any remedy for it, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I make no point of order, and I trust the House will not adjourn. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania is desirous to speak to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not wish to speak unless a quorum be present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware how, after a call of the House and no quorum appearing, the matter can be waived by unanimous consent. The House is in that dilemma that it must send for the absentees or adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say a word in explanation of the motion I made. The House was liberal when it agreed to an adjournment of two weeks for the Christmas holidays. Yesterday unanimous consent was asked by some member of the House that no business should be transacted to-day, and it was refused. We came here supposing there would be a quorum present for the transaction of business, and find that members have left. I think that the practice growing up is a bad one, that when we adjourn to a particular day members regard it as an adjournment from the day before and go off leaving the House without a quorum. It is unfair to the members who remain. It is unfair to the country.

Mr. WILSON. I insist on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 64, not voting 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Denison, Dixon, Eden, Eldridge, Harding, King, Law, Le Blond, McBride, Nelson, Noble, Pike, Pruyn, Shannon, Sweet, Townsend, and Winfield—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grider, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Worthington, and Yeaman—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Blaine, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Dumont, Edgerton, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Sloan, Starr, William G. Steele, Stiles, Thayer, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—96.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring upon the motion of Mr. BEAMAN, that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, it was put and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. NOBLE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. By way of compromise, I have a suggestion to make. I would like to inquire of the Speaker whether it is not possible that we can go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so as to give to any gentleman who desires to speak the opportunity to do so, with an understanding that after we come out of the Committee of the Whole no further proceedings of a business character shall be had in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he is unaware of any mode by which the House, in its present dilemma, can proceed to do any business unless a quorum is present. It is a constitutional provision that a quorum shall be present to do business.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Cannot we suspend the Constitution a moment or two? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I move there be a call of the House, and upon it demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPALDING. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 88) suspending the sale, by sealed bids, of the lands of the Kansas and Sac and Fox Indians, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ADJOURNMENT—AGAIN.

The question was then put on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 45, nays 43, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Baily, Beaman, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. So the motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly, in pursuance to a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, adjourned until the 5th day of January next.

W. M. Stewart and J. W. Nye] shall take their seats in the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADE presented several petitions of citizens of Geauga and Lake counties, Ohio, praying for the passage of the preamble and resolution offered by Mr. Chandler in the United States Senate, December 14, 1864, directing inquiry into the expediency of enlisting an Army corps to watch and defend our territory bordering on the Canadian frontier; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of James Guthrie, president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and D. Ricketts, president of the Jeffersonville Railroad Company, praying for an amendment of the law authorizing the construction of bridges across the Ohio river so that their companies may be allowed to construct a railroad bridge at the head of the falls of the Ohio fifty-four or fifty-six feet above low-water mark, without the required span of three hundred feet, and that it be made a postal route for the United States mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the commissioned officers of the fourth brigade, first division, twenty-fourth Army corps, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 369) for the relief of the occupants of the lands of the mission of San José, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. Mr. CONNESS also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 371) to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors on the Pacific coast of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 372) allowing mileage to the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No. 374) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CREDITS FOR NAVAL ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate the number of men enlisted into the naval service of the United States that have been credited upon the military quotas of the respective States, and upon what principles, in what manner, and upon what evidence such credits were made.

COTTON CAPTURED AT SAVANNAH.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the avails of the sales of such cotton captured at Savannah as may be confiscated to the United States among the officers and men composing the army of General Sherman, on principles analogous to those adopted in the distribution of prize money in the naval service.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the prior orders, if there are any, be postponed with a view that the pension appropriation bill may be now considered.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 597) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate the following sums for the payment of pensions for the year ending June 30, 1866: for invalid pensions under various acts, $4,000,000; for revolutionary pensions, per acts of March 18, 1818, May 15, 1828, June 7, 1832, third section of act of July 7, 1838, March 3, 1843, June 17, 1844, February 2, and July 29, 1848, and second section of act of February 3, 1853, $230,000; for pensions to widows, mothers, children, and sisters, under the first section of the act of July 4, 1836, act of July 21, 1848, first section of the act of February 3, 1853, June 3, 1858, and July 14, 1862, $7,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the present fiscal year:

For the payment of pensions under the acts of March 18, 1818, May 15, 1828, June 7, 1832, the third section of the act of July 4, 1836, July 7, 1838, June 17, 1844, March 3, 1843, February 2, and July 29, 1848, and the second section of the act of February 3, 1853, $65,000.

For the payment of pensions under the first section of the act of July 4, 1836, act of July 20, 1848, the first section of the act of February 3, 1853, June 3, 1858, and July 14, 1862, $3,500,000.

Before action is had upon this amendment I will ask the Secretary to read two letters explaining the reason of this very large deficiency in pensions.

The Secretary read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, December 10, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, a copy of a communication addressed to the Department on the 6th instant, by the Commissioner of Pensions, relative to the state of the appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions during the present fiscal year; from which it will be perceived that a large deficiency exists, which it is very desirable should be provided for as early a day in the session as may be practicable.

I have, therefore, the honor to recommend the following additional appropriations for the service of the present fiscal year, namely:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the payment of pensions under the acts of March 18, 1818, May 15, 1828, June 7, 1832, third section of act July 4, 1836, July 7, 1838, June 17, 1844, March 3, 1843, February 2, and July 29, 1848, and second section of act February 3, 1853, $65,000.

Under acts first section July 4, 1836, July 21, 1848, first section February 3, 1853, and the acts of June 3, 1858, and July 14, 1862, $3,500,000.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee on Finance, Senate of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
PENSION OFFICE, December 6, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the additional compensation to agents for paying pensions provided by the act of June 30, 1864, (page 325,) is payable out of the appropriation for paying pensions allowed to soldiers in the revolutionary war, and to their widows.

The amount of appropriations under those acts remaining unexpended on the 30th day of June, 1864, was $171,432 31. The amount that has been already drawn from the Treasury to December 1, 1864, is $109,300, leaving for the service of the succeeding seven months $62,132 31.

It is estimated that there will be required for this fiscal year $230,000; making a deficiency under these acts the sum of say $65,000.

The amount of unexpended appropriation to pay pensions, under the various acts, for widows, children, mothers, and sisters in the wars subsequent to the Revolution was, on the 30th day of June, 1864, $891,622 31. Add appropriation for the current year, $2,200,000. Total for service of the present year, $3,691,622 31. During the five months to December 1, 1864, there has been drawn from the Treasury $2,927,165 23, leaving on hand $164,457 08, which will probably be exhausted by the middle of January next.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 8.

The estimates of this class of pensioners for the fiscal year 1863-64 were based on the 4,820 already on the rolls and 11,000 to be added during the year, amounting to $3,709,000. On the 30th June, 1864, there were actually on the rolls 25,433 pensioners, making the addition of new pensioners nearly double the estimates. The estimates for new pensioners for 1864-65 were 10,000, but the actual number for five months to December 1, 1864, is 9,208, showing that there will be a large deficiency in the appropriation, and not less probably than $3,500,000.

In view of these facts I have respectfully to ask that an additional appropriation may be requested of Congress for the service of the present fiscal year, as follows:

Under acts March 18, 1818, May 15, 1823, June 7, 1832, third section July 4, 1836, July 7, 1838, June 17, 1844, March 3, 1843, February 2, and July 29, 1848, and second section February 3, 1853, $65,000. Under acts first section July 4, 1833, July 31, 1848, first section February 3, 1853, June 3, 1858, and July 14, 1852, $3,500,000.

In order to give time to the agents to make their arrangements and to remit the money from the Treasury, the requisitions are made during the first week in February for the payments due on the 4th of March following. As there will be no appropriation from which to pay widows' pensions at that semi-annual payment, it is desirable that this deficiency be provided for at an early period of the session of Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH H. BARRETT, Commissioner.
Hon. J. P. USHER, Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

FREEDOM OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no other business of the morning hour, the unfinished business of the Senate at its last adjournment was Senate joint resolution No. 82, to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS], to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I hope it will not be referred. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FOOT. Let the resolution be read at length to give the Senate an understanding of what it is.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say that this resolution in substance has been three times reported, has been debated in the Senate, and was debated at the last session. I hope it will be referred to no committee, but that we shall pass it at the earliest possible moment. Since its introduction here, I have received letters from officers in the Army, and persons who are engaged in recruiting, all approving and indorsing the idea embodied in it. I do not wish to detain the Senate by discussing the question at this time. If Senators will refer to the Globe, they will find that it was debated for hours at the last session of Congress, and fully debated. I hope now for action instead of words.

Mr. DAVIS. If I recollect aright, when this subject was last before the Senate, one of the Senators from Delaware took the floor and occupied it, when the Senate adjourned, on that subject. That is my recollection. I do not feel confident that such is the state of facts. I will thank the Clerk to inform the Chair whether I am right or not. If I am right in my recollection, I would suggest that this resolution be laid over until tomorrow, to enable that Senator to get into his seat. I know he wishes to be heard on the subject, and has made preparation to make a speech. I hope, if that be the fact, that the courtesy will be extended to him of continuing the subject over until tomorrow.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether that be the fact or not. If it be so, I certainly do not desire to take the floor from the Senator from Delaware. A motion has been made, however, to commit the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary; the yeas and nays have been ordered, and I hope we shall take the vote and have that matter out of the way. Let us decide that motion one way or the other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall vote to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and my reasons are very simple and very direct. The Senate has already passed a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to put an end to the slavery question, in all its forms, by an amendment of the fundamental law of the land, which is above Congress, above the Supreme Court, and above the President; and which when once established, no change of Presidents, no change of the decisions of the Supreme Court, and no change of the legislation of Congress can affect at all. That measure, sir, which passed the Senate at the last session, is now pending in the House of Representatives; and, as I am informed—and I believe the Journals of the House show it to be so—next Monday is fixed as the day upon which that House is to act. Of course I do not know what will be the decision of that House; but I have strong hopes, and, I think, good reasons to believe, that the House of Representatives will adopt that proposition. It will at once, if adopted by the House, be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, and passed upon undoubtedly during the present winter, before the adjournment of the Legislatures in the Spring; and thus the vexed question, and the whole of it, will be disposed of and put outside of Congress, and outside of its power or control, and there will be an end to the agitation of the question.

Why, Mr. President, although perhaps at the last session some of the members of the Democratic party in the House of Representatives were disposed to resist the adoption of this constitutional amendment, I have good reason to believe that some of them, at least, will favor it now, for when Jefferson Davis himself, with his cabinet and the press at Richmond, recommend the abandonment of the institution of slavery in the southern confederacy, why should the Democracy in the northern States have any reason to hold on to it any longer? Sir, they will have no reason for it and no excuse for it, and I believe that the proposition will triumph, and when it triumphs here in Congress I have just as little doubt that it will receive the sanction of three fourths of the States; and when that is done, this great question, the cause of all our troubles, the question which, like sin, has brought into this our paradise "death and all our woe," covering the land with blood and ashes, will be finally settled, and settled forever, by the supreme judgment of the great American people, expressed in the constitutional form, by an amendment to the Constitution itself.

I therefore hope that my honorable friend will consent to allow this resolution to be referred to the Judiciary Committee, that the House of Representatives may pass on the main question, and let us not be all the while disturbing ourselves with the mere incident, but let the whole question pass from Congress and go to the Legislatures and to the people of the country, and be settled at once and forever. Hence I shall vote for the motion to refer.

Mr. President, there is one other suggestion I wish to make. There are those who seriously doubt whether we have the constitutional power to do what is now proposed by this measure. Among our friends—just as earnest friends of our cause, and opposed to slavery as much as my friend from Massachusetts—there are those who seriously doubt whether you have the constitutional power to pass this resolution in the form in which it is placed; but no one can have any doubt that it is constitutional to amend the Constitution. All can agree in that, when perhaps this, pressed to a vote, might produce a division among the real friends of freedom in the country.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I certainly cannot consent to have this resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without the vote of the Senate to do so; I cannot agree to it. The Senator from Wisconsin tells us that there is an amendment to the Constitution pending; that he has strong hopes that it will pass the House of Representatives on Monday next or next week. Well, sir, I had hoped that that measure would pass next week; I have more doubt about it now; but whether it passes or not the Senator from Wisconsin knows, and we all know, that it cannot and will not become a part of the Constitution for many months; I think not for about two years, at least, and it may be three or four years; certainly not within the next eighteen months.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. During the next spring.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator is very much mistaken. The fact is, sir, that the Congress of the United States, at the last session, did decide that the man who would enlist in the armies of the United States should be free, free forever, free by the fiat of the Government of the United States. If anybody doubts the constitutionality of that law, let him test it. Now, sir, the wife and the children of the men we have made free are held as slaves. We had the evidence, at the last session of Congress, how they were treated in Missouri, from Army officers. The facts were presented to the Senate, and shocked the sense of humanity of every man who heard the recital, or who read what was going on there. What we had then in Missouri has been doubled and trebled since, and the wrongs and the outrages that have been perpetrated during the last year upon the wives and children of the soldiers who are fighting the battles of the country, if known to the people of the country, would shock their humanity and their sense of justice.

Of the power to do this I do not entertain a doubt, and the most eminent lawyers of this country concur in this opinion. We may and probably shall have to pay for them. The masters may have a claim against the Government. They will no doubt come here with the claim, and it may be that the claim will be fully allowed, though of course I cannot say how that will be; the claim is an open one; but I have no doubt of our power to pass this resolution, and I think we should not hesitate a moment in doing so at a time when we want soldiers, when we are calling for men to join the Army, when we are pressing the want of men upon the country. We read already—the Senator has referred to it—what is taking place in the rebel States, what Jefferson Davis proposes, what the Richmond papers propose, to give freedom to the slaves, and to give them an interest in lands. They who commenced this revolution for the purpose of making slavery eternal now in their necessities are talking about making slaves freemen to fight the battles of the rebellion! I think that we owe it to the country, we owe it to the cause of the country, to liberty, to justice, and to patriotism, to offer every inducement to every black man who can fight the battles of the country to join our armies. You have offered him his freedom, and he is to go and leave his wife and children to the tender mercy of others. Wife and children appeal now to him not to go and abandon them. Make that wife and those children free and they will appeal to him to enroll his name among the defenders of the country to win his own liberty and theirs.

Now, sir, this is a simple, plain proposition. It is before the Senate; it has been considered many days in this Congress, and I hope it will not now be again referred to a committee, but that we shall consider it and pass it promptly.

Mr. DAVIS. I am happy to see my friend from Delaware in his place, and as he is now in his place, I withdraw the suggestion which I made a short time since that the resolution should be laid over, in courtesy to him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when this resolution of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts was presented to the Senate it was my intention to address the body on the subject; and it is still my intention to do so, not to-day, however. I understand that the pending proposition is to refer the resolution to a committee. To me it is a matter of personal indifference whether it is referred to a committee or whether it is considered directly by the body. On the whole, I would rather address the Senate to-morrow than to-day, as I have been traveling for a couple of days past, and have just arrived in the city.

Mr. President, when this question comes up for bold, manly discussion before the Senate of the United States, I hope it will be discussed in a spirit of charity, with no bitterness of feeling on either side. I should like the advocates of this measure to present arguments to the Senate to convince them, if possible, that it is within their power, as the legislators of the country, to pass a measure of this kind. I do not wish to hear, if I may be pardoned the remark, speeches upon the evils of slavery, upon the wickedness of slavery; but I wish the question to be met in this light: have we the power, have we the authority, under the Constitution of the United States, to enact a law of this kind? Has the Congress of the United States the constitutional authority to enter within the limits of the respective States, and to declare that any person who is held in slavery under the constitution and laws of that particular State shall be free? Has the modern doctrine of "military necessity" gone so far that when we are in a state of war, whatever the Congress of the United States shall decree, is constitutionally decreed? I ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Military Committee, who has introduced this bill, when he comes to present his reasons for its passage to the American people and to the Congress of the United States, to point us out the authority to pass it.

Sir, there are some questions which, in law, are settled; there are some questions which, as constitutional questions, have been settled, and long settled. When this question shall legitimately come before the Senate for full discussion, I shall maintain the doctrine that not only have you not the power to decree the freedom of the wife and the children of negroes who volunteer in your Army, if they are from States where slavery is recognized, but you cannot give permanent freedom to the negro volunteer himself if he be a slave. There is no principle more clearly recognized in international law than this, that if a slave be captured from his lawful owner by one belligerent, and he afterwards comes back into the possession of the other belligerent by recapture, he reverts, according to the doctrine of the jus postluminii, not to the belligerent Power, but to his original owner. So, sir, I say to-day that if you go into a State of the southern confederacy and dress up a slave in your uniform and put him in your Army, although you may by all the solemnity of an act of Congress say that he shall be forever free, yet if he be recaptured, when recaptured he is no longer a free man; he does not belong to the southern confederacy; but the southern confederacy is bound to deliver him to his original owner.

That, sir, is the international law. It is the law which a great and distinguished statesman from the honorable Senator's own State maintained when he was a member of the Cabinet; it is the doctrine which he maintained when he was minister abroad. John Quincy Adams, from the Senator's own State, gave to this doctrine his sanction. When, during our last war with Great Britain, the British forces undertook to carry away slaves from this country, no man was more earnest than was John Quincy Adams in demanding from the British Government compensation for the value of those slaves. Sir, he was strong in his language; he said it was just as lawful to use poisoned weapons in warfare as it was to take slaves under the pretense that they had the right, under the law of nations, and in the exercise of military authority, to do so. The doctrine which John Quincy Adams then avowed, and which through his efforts was recognized by the English Government, has been the settled doctrine of the American nation, not only from that time to the present, but it was settled even anterior to that period. When John Jay was minister of foreign affairs of this country, he proclaimed the same doctrine, and he made foreign nations recognize it; and through every page in the diplomatic history of the country you find the same doctrine avowed without a dissenting voice. And yet, sir, simply because we are engaged in a gigantic civil war; one which pals the imagination; one at which the thoughtful statesman stands aghast; a war the issue of which no man living can see; a war in which everything that is dear to the American heart and to the American mind is being overthrown, we find propositions of this nature presented to the American Senate!

It seems to me that we have lost sight entirely of the character of our Federal system; pardon me, sir, of our federated system. We are considering this as a great central power; such things as States and State rights are wholly ignored. We seem to think that the States of the American Union are nothing more than simply the counties of particular States. If that doctrine is to prevail; if the doctrine that we are not to have "the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is," is to prevail, but that we are simply to have the Union as it shall be, and the Constitution as it will be made, there is the death of constitutional American liberty.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there was a call only a few days ago for three hundred thousand more troops. The country needs them, and it is the duty of Congress to help supply them. To this end there must be no difficulty, impediment, or embarrassment in the way. All these must be removed. But this is not all. There must be encouragement of every kind; and such is the character of the present proposition.

There can be no delay. The country cannot wait the slow action of a constitutional amendment, as has been proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] Congress must act to the extent of its power, and any abdication of its power on this question will be injurious to the public interests.

All must confess the humanity of the proposition to enfranchise the families of colored persons who have borne arms for their country. All must confess the hardship of continuing them in slavery.

But the question is asked by many, and even by the Senator from Wisconsin, what power has Congress to set the families free?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not ask that question.

Mr. SUMNER. I understood—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator is entirely mistaken. He is putting a question himself and then answering it. I have not put it at all.

Mr. SUMNER. The question has been put again and again, and the whole purport of the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin was in that sense. He argued that we were about to have a constitutional amendment which was to supersede everything; that therefore this proposition was unnecessary, if not injurious. I so understood the argument of the Senator, and that it pointed directly to the question of the power of Congress on this occasion, because I know the patriotism of that Senator too well to suppose that, if in his opinion the power of Congress on this occasion was beyond question, he would hesitate. I do not therefore do the Senator any injustice. I say, then, the question is asked, what power has Congress to set the families free? This is the single point on which I shall express an opinion.

My answer is that Congress has precisely the same power to enfranchise the families that it has to enfranchise the colored soldier. The two powers are coincident and from the same source.

It has been already assumed that Congress may enfranchise the colored soldier. This has been done by solemn statute, without any reference to the conduct of his pretended owner. If we were asked the reason for such enfranchisement, it must be found, first, in its practical necessity, that we may secure the best services of the slaves, and secondly, in its intrinsic justice and humanity. In brief, Government cannot be so improvident and so foolish as to attempt to obtain the services of the slave at the hazard of life, without securing to him the boon of freedom. Now, if Government were so bereft of common sense as to forego this temptation to enlistment and efficient service, could it be guilty of the unutterable meanness of using the slave in the national defense and then returning him to bondage? Therefore the slave who fights is enfranchised.

But every argument, every consideration, which pleads for the enfranchisement of the slave pleads also for the enfranchisement of the family. There is the same practical necessity for doing it, and the same unutterable shabbiness in not doing it.

There is no principle of law better established than the rule that any acknowledged right carries with it all incidents essential to its exercise. I do not employ technical language; but I give the idea, which is founded in reason and the nature of things. It would be vain to confer a right, or a power, if the means for its enjoyment were denied. From this simple statement the conclusion is irresistible.

In conferring upon Congress the power to create an Army, the Constitution conferred therewith all the powers essential to the exercise of the principal power. If Congress can authorize the enlistment of slaves, as it unquestionably can, it may at the same time authorize their enfranchisement, and by the same reason it may authorize the enfranchisement of their families; and all this from the necessity of the case, and to prevent an intolerable meanness.

An English patriot, nearly two centuries ago, exclaimed in memorable words that he would give his life to serve his country, but he would not do a mean thing to save it. If there be any value in this declaration it may well be invoked when it is deliberately argued that the national Government can create an Army, and in this service can enfranchise the slave which it enlists, but that it is impotent to enfranchise his family. I know not how we can use his right arm and ask him to shed his blood in our defense and then hand over his wife and child to bondage. The case is too clear for argument. The human heart rejects the insufferable pretension.

But it is said that the slave has no family. Such is the argument of slavery. For all that he has, as well as all that he is, even wife and child, belong to another. Surely this unrighteous pretension will not be made the apology for a denial of rights. If the family of the slave be not designated by law, or by the forms of legal marriage, then it must be ascertained by the next best evidence possible; that is, by cohabitation and mutual recognition as man and wife. And any uncertainty in this evidence must be regarded as a natural incident to slavery. As men cannot take advantage of their own wrong, so slave masters, on this occasion, cannot take advantage of slavery. Any other rule would practically unite with slavery in denying to the slave wife and child.

There is a well-known French maxim, that "it is only the first step which costs"—ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte—and on this occasion, permit me to say, it is only the first stage of the argument which merits attention. Concede that the soldier may be enfranchised, and it follows that by the same constitutional power his family may be admitted to an equal liberty. Any other conclusion would be as illogical as inhuman; discreditable alike to the head and the heart. There is no argument, whether of reason or of humanity, for the enfranchisement of the soldier which does not plead equally for that of his family. Nay, more; I know not how we can expect a blessing on our arms while we fail to perform this duty.

I cannot close what I have to say without adding that, in my opinion, Congress at this moment is complete master of the whole question of slavery everywhere in the United States, even without any constitutional amendment. It can sweep it all out of existence, precisely as it can remove any other obstruction to the national defense, and all this by virtue of a power as indisputable as the power to raise armies or to suspend the habeas corpus. Future generations will read with amazement that a great people, when national life was assailed, hesitated to exercise a power so simple and beneficent; and this amazement will know no bounds as they learn that Congress higgled for months on the question whether the wife and children of the colored soldier should be admitted to freedom.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. Understand the Senator from Delaware desires to address the Senate to-morrow on this subject, and I am willing that it should go over for that purpose; but I should like to take the vote now on the question of reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Sainsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Hale, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the House bill No. 583.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; which proposes to amend that section so as to read as follows:

"That any alien, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has enlisted or shall enlist in the armies of the United States, either volunteer or regular forces, or in the naval or marine forces, and has been, or shall hereafter be, honorably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and that the court admitting such alien shall, in addition to the proof of residence and good moral character, as is now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States as aforesaid.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as additional sections:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That it is not within the intent of the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to authorize the brevetting of volunteer and other officers in the United States service," authorizing the President to confer brevet rank for gallant actions and meritorious conduct, to make a distinction as to pay between officers of volunteers and other forces, including the regular Army; but that such brevet rank does not entitle any officer, either of the regular Army or volunteers, to any increase of pay or emoluments.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That if a soldier, discharged for wounds received in battle, die before receiving the bounty provided by the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the employment of volunteers," &c., the bounty due shall descend to his heirs in the same manner and order of succession as if he had died in the service.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that there is any objection to the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts, but it appears to me it is rather out of place on this bill. The bill itself is a bill to naturalize foreigners. He proposes to insert an amendment which looks to brevet rank in the Army. It is always desirable, as everybody knows who has had occasion to consult acts of Congress, that the laws should be so framed that we should know by their titles exactly where to look for them. It seems to me better, therefore, that the honorable member from Massachusetts should introduce his proposition as a separate bill.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the Senator from Maryland that the bill, as it comes to us from the House of Representatives, is a bill to construe a certain section of another act. Both the sections of my amendment are of a similar character. They refer to other acts, and say how they shall be understood. I thought it was fit that these propositions should go together. I certainly see no reason why they should not. This bill, as it comes from the House of Representatives, simply provides for putting alien sailors on the same footing with alien soldiers, and construes the law to read hereafter in that form. I simply propose by this amendment to provide that the act authorizing brevetting shall not be construed to make any distinction between volunteer officers and officers of the regular Army. I understand that there has been some construction of the Department recently which makes a distinction between the regular Army and the volunteers. I am sure none was intended by Congress, and that none ought to exist.

Mr. GRIMES. I think there can be no objection to the original bill; that is, to include among the persons who shall be naturalized by entering into the service of the United States during the war persons serving in the Navy as well as in the Army. The section which I should object to being called upon to pass at this time more particularly is the second section of the amendment, that which regulates the descent of the bounty of a soldier. I have in my possession, but not here, a letter which I received a couple of weeks ago from the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in which he explains the complexities there are at this time existing, growing out of the various laws we now have on this subject. I think at the last session of Congress, or at any rate during the last two sessions of Congress, we established by our enactments three different methods for the descent of the bounty due to soldiers and sailors. He has sent to me a copy of a bill which he threw out as suggestions for gentlemen to consider, and I would prefer, if the Senator from Massachusetts would assent to it, that this amendment, or at any rate this second section, which relates to the descent of the bounty, should be postponed until we can give further consideration to the subject. At present the laws are very conflicting on that subject, and now there is a different order of descent for the bounty that is paid to a sailor from that which is paid to a soldier. They ought to be uniform, and I think they could easily be made uniform if we had a few hours to consider the subject.

Mr. WILSON. That being the case, I have no desire to press the question now. On the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I am willing to let the whole subject go over in order to give him an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the subject goes over I desire to submit an amendment to this bill, which probably had better be printed, because I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it. I may modify the language; but I will submit it now so that it may be under consideration:

And be it further enacted, That no alien who has resided in the United States for five years continuously before the 19th day of April, 1861, shall be naturalized under the laws of the United States after the 1st day of April, 1865, anything in any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The idea I wish to embody—perhaps the proposition should be expressed in different language—is this: there are, especially in the large cities, large numbers of able-bodied aliens, many of whom have made enormous fortunes by engaging in trade, who, the very moment the war broke out, refused to perfect their naturalization, and thus evaded all military service. Such men ought to be denied the privilege hereafter of citizenship. It is a plain and obvious matter of justice. I want to provide for that very numerous class of people in this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the further consideration of this subject will be postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and, after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 5, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Thursday, December 22, 1864, was read and approved.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE WITH REBELLIOUS STATES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Major General

E. R. S. Canby, commanding the military division of West Mississippi, concerning the purchase by the United States of the products of States declared to be in insurrection, called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 22, 1864.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think that communication should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I make that motion. We have this whole subject before us. A resolution was introduced by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BUTTWELL] instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into this whole matter of trade with the rebellious States. The subject is now before the committee and is being investigated. The committee sent a similar inquiry to the Secretary of War, wider in its scope than the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Secretary determined that he would answer the whole in reply to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and so notified us. I think it proper that the communication should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ELIOT. I am inclined to think that the suggestions of the gentleman from the Military Committee are correct, and, under the circumstances, I shall not object to the reference of the communication to the Committee on Military Affairs. I withdraw my motion.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LAWS OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the laws of the Territory of New Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

SOLDIERS' PAY.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers of the United States Army, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1864, and to increase the commutation value of rations for general and post hospitals; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed three thousand copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1864; two thousand for distribution by the Coast Survey and one thousand for the use of the members of this House.

BURSTING OF GUNS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House, so far as he has knowledge, what number of guns were burst on board our fleet in the late bombardment of Fort Fisher; on what ships they were mounted; the cause of their failure; the number of persons killed and wounded thereby; and whether any of such guns were of unwrought iron construction.

RANK OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of another lieutenant general, to be selected from the list of major generals now in the service, whose rank shall be inferior to the lieutenant general commanding the armies, and superior to all other officers in the service.

Mr. COX. I object.

DISTRICT COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. LOAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for holding courts in the western district of Missouri, and to prescribe the times thereof; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

Mr. LOAN also introduced, by unanimous consent, a bill to constitute the city of St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CLERICAL APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution relative to appointments in the various Departments; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that all vacancies which may hereafter occur in the clerical force in the War, Navy, Treasury, Interior, and Post Office Departments, shall be filled proportionately by soldiers and sailors disabled by wounds received in battle, who are competent to perform the duties, or who may quickly be instructed therein; and also that the places of the present incumbents shall be filled by similar appointments as rapidly as changes can be made without detriment to the public service.

Mr. A. W. CLARK demanded the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. Would the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. W. CLARK] have any objection to refer this joint resolution to a committee? It is taking upon ourselves great power.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I think the House is prepared to act upon it now.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the previous question will not be sustained. This is a very good clap-trap thing, I know; but it is a great stretch of power.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. W. CLARK] one question in reference to one phrase in this resolution. To what does the word "proportionately" refer—to the Army or the civil service?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Proportionate to the number of applicants presenting themselves.

Mr. GANSON. I would inquire if it is intended to throw out all the females now employed in the Departments.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. W. CLARK] will strike out the word "proportionately;" otherwise I must move to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done now except by unanimous consent.

The question was then taken upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to refer the joint resolution to the Judiciary Committee.

The question was taken, and the motion to refer was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes, approved July 2, 1863, in which they asked the concurrence of the House.

NATIONAL TELEGRAPH UNION.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to incorporate the National Telegraph Union.

REFUGEES FROM REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. LAW, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire whether any, and if so, what, legislative action is necessary on the part of Congress to afford relief to the distressed and destitute women and children, refugees from the rebel States, who have located within the Union States; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

NAVAL RECRUITS.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the House the rule adopted by him, if any, in apportioning naval recruits among the different enrollment districts under section eight of an act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1864, and to state further the proof of residence required by him in making assignments of naval recruits under that section.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the resolution by adding the words "and by what provision of law in apportioning in the Army a man enlisted for three years is counted as three men."

Mr. PIKE. I accept that amendment.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

BOUNTIES TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. LAW, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, when a soldier is discharged on account of wounds received in battle, and dying before receiving the bounty provided by the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers," whether the bounty due to him should not descend to his heirs in the same manner and succession as if the soldier had died in service.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the resolution so that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the purpose indicated in the resolution.

Mr. LAW. I accept the amendment.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

RECRUITING BROKERS.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for dispensing with the services of recruiting brokers, and prohibiting their pay or reward for any such services or pretended services.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move that, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 363, an act to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company, be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to suspend the rules in order to take up the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made on Thursday.

OVERLAND CALIFORNIA MAIL.

Mr. DAILY, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to furnish to this House copies of all advertisements for the late letting of the contract for carrying the overland California mail, with all the bids, the names of bidders, and all correspondence relating to the same (with any offers to contract) by the Department, and the name of the party, and the amount at which the contract was finally let.

RAILROAD FARE IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. HERRICK, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the city railroad companies in the city of New York, whose rates of fare are prescribed by the laws of the State and the ordinances of the city, have increased such rates twenty per cent., by authority of the last proviso of section one hundred and three of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, upon the pretense that they can in no other way collect from their passengers the internal revenue tax of two and a half per cent. imposed upon the gross receipts of said railroad companies, as authorized by said act: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act to provide internal revenue, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1864, as empowers railroad companies to increase their rates of passenger fare beyond the rates established by local laws, or of so amending the last proviso of the one hundred and third section of such act that it will not be capable of being construed into a permission for the New York city railroad companies to collect from passengers a higher rate of fare than is prescribed for them by the laws of the State of New York and the ordinances of the city of New York.

THANKS TO GENERAL SHERMAN.

Mr. COLE, of California. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following joint resolution, and ask that it be put upon its passage:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the thanks of the people and of the Congress of the United States are due and are hereby tendered to Major General William T. Sherman, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in their late brilliant expedition through Georgia; and that the President cause a copy of this joint resolution to be engrossed and forwarded to Major General Sherman.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope that it will be passed without a reference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make this motion only because I object to any resolution of this nature going through without being properly referred, not because I am not in favor of this resolution. I am in favor of it. But I desire that, as a rule, all resolutions of this character shall be referred.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to; and the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CREDITS FOR RECRUITS AND CONSRIPTS.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to consider the expediency of providing by an act of Congress that cannot be misinterpreted or evaded, that all men enlisted or drafted into the military service shall be credited to the city, ward, town, or district to which they belong by residence, provided they have a legal residence in any duly organized enrollment district.

WAGON ROAD IN MONTANA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a wagon road from the Missouri river to Virginia City, in Montana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a competent stenographic reporter, to continue in office until otherwise ordered by the House, whose duty it shall be to report in shorthand on the order of any of the standing or special committees of the House such proceedings as they may deem necessary, and when ordered to be printed, properly index and supervise the publication of the same, and who shall receive therefor an annual compensation at the rate now allowed by regulation for reporting court-martial proceedings.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received.

Mr. WILSON demanded the previous question on its adoption.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent of the House to be excused from further service on the special committee in reference to the ventilation of the two Halls of Congress. I find that I shall be unable to attend to my duties on other standing committees if I remain on that committee; and I hope that the House will excuse me.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

GOLD BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution for reference:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill to prevent combinations being formed to raise the price of coin and depreciate the value of lawful money of the United States.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask my colleague to withdraw his objection, so that I may be heard on my resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his recent annual report, calls the attention of Congress to combinations of men to raise the price of coin and depreciate the value of the lawful money of the United States, and asks us to provide some remedy for the evil. It may possibly be recollected that on the second day of the session I had the honor to introduce a bill which was designed to accomplish that object. The next morning, as soon as the Journal was read, my excellent friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] in an alarmed and excited manner informed the House that that bill was fraught with innumerable mischiefs; that it would destroy the interests of the country. I do not speak exactly as he spoke. He said that it would prevent and prohibit importation. In that I think he made a mistake. He said that it was fraught with all of the evils—not in this language—of the fabled Pandora's box. It was an unheard-of bill, and he modestly stated that it was an absurdity. The House, partaking of the magnetic manner of my friend from Maine—he seemed to be distracted on the subject—and wishing to escape the evils of this gunpowder plot, immediately laid it on the table.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that my colleague to whom he refers is not now present.

Mr. STEVENS. He is now sitting before me. [Laughter.] If he had not been present I would not have referred to him. It is because he is present that I have so freely referred to the gentleman. I mean kindly all that I have said.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying, when interrupted, that the House, being magnetized by the excited manner of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] became alarmed and immediately laid the bill on the table, without its being presented, and without a single member having had an opportunity to read a word of it. I remember the gentleman stated that the very announcement of the bill the day before had raised the price of gold twelve per cent. He stated that there were telegrams to that effect. I remember what was said by the able editors, sciolists who prate deeply in reference to things of which they know nothing. I know that they repeated what my excellent friend had taught them. We were told that it was an anomalous proceeding never heard of before. It was likened to an effort to regulate the course of the planets, to guide the sun and moon. I remember to have heard an excellent friend, in a solito voce, say that it was like an attempt to make the mercury in a thermometer regulate the weather.

Mr. Speaker, all these suggestions, all these imputations, all the statements that my proposition was preposterous and absurd, of course had no effect upon me. I have heard too much of that in the past to care for it. I disregard all these imputations. But, sir, it is due to the respectable gentlemen who, on that occasion, to the number of fifty or sixty, voted with me, that I should lay some facts before this House, and the country, to rescue them from the imputation of ignorance, and to expose the ignorance of those who made the assertions I have mentioned. I only detain the House for that purpose.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, by every member of this House that in 1793 England entered into a war with France, and that finally she entered single-handed into a war with the whole of continental Europe. At that time the Bank of England was her fiscal agent. The bank for a while went on prosperously under these circumstances, the Bank of England notes being at par and there being no demand for coin at that time, as the Government had not fallen into the error of making a portion of their debt payable in coin and part in paper. But about 1797 there came to be a continental loan, which England found it necessary to contract with continental nations, and gold became necessary. Then it was that class of men called "gold gamblers," as they are now named, saw proper in England to combine for the purpose of raising the price of gold, and in 1809 it went up, I think, to eight or nine per cent., and was going on; and as the armies of Great Britain went upon the Continent it was necessary to supply them with gold, which increased the demand and enabled these persons to make use of their power to raise the price of the article, and in 1810 and 1811 it was at sixteen and seventeen per cent., and finally at one period, I think, it rose as high as forty per cent.

The British Parliament became alarmed at the action of this combination, for in 1797, when gold had become so high, the Government by an Order in Council restricted and prohibited the Bank of England from paying cash until after the meeting of Parliament, and upon the meeting of Parliament a law was passed making valid the Order in Council and prohibiting the payment of coin until six months after the final proclamation of peace. And at the same time, although the Bank of England notes were not made a legal tender, yet a law was passed which took away the remedy by arrest or by distraint of any creditor who refused to receive Bank of England notes when tendered. A Bank of England note was not a full tender, as our note is, but the law prohibited all process of protection in case of a refusal to receive the notes of the Bank of England.

This took place, as I have said, in 1797, but still there was very little rise in the price of gold until the time I have mentioned, up to 1809, 1810, and 1811; then, when gold was sent to subsidize the armies of Great Britain in Europe, the gold gamblers combined to raise the price of gold and depress the price of Bank of England notes; and the wise statesmen of England, who never thought of attempting to regulate the moon or stars in the British Parliament, put their heads together to see if some law could be devised which would correct this evil and check the rise in gold.

I remember that Lord Stanhope, then an eminent British statesman, was the first to move a bill in 1811 for that purpose, which was supported, not by ignorant men, not by men guilty of absurdities, but by the great Lord Chancellor Eldon, and by the great financier Vansittart. That bill passed the British Parliament in 1811. I admit that it was an experiment only, and was limited to three months after the next meeting of Parliament, and then it was found to have worked so beneficially that it was enlarged, and improved, and reenacted.

Now, if gentlemen will not think that I am attempting to expose their want of knowledge, I will send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read the bills of the British Parliament, which are exact copies of the bill which I presented to this House for a similar purpose, and under the similar circumstances of the country.

Before the Clerk reads, however, I will simply say that I looked at the money article in the New York Tribune to see how much gold rose on the day that I introduced my bill, and I found the following paragraph in the paper of the 7th of December:

"Gold opened at 229½, sold up to 232½, and closed at 232. The leading buyers were 'seecesh houses,' encouraged by the proposition to prohibit the export of gold coin."

I see by the same authority that after my bill was laid on the table, hardly had the knowledge of it reached New York than gold went up to 240, and remained so for ten days.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will allow me a word, I think he will admit the correctness of what I stated. The gentleman introduced his bill on Tuesday, December 6, near the hour of one o'clock. The intelligence of it was not known in New York city, on the street, until three o'clock, after banking and brokers' hours. The next morning, when the contents and scope of that bill were fully made known in Wall street, gold opened at twelve per cent. advance on the rate of the day before. That advance took place, therefore, several hours before the House took action on the bill on my motion. Now, when the gentleman speaks of the laying that bill on the table as the cause of the rise in gold—

Mr. STEVENS. I did not say it was the cause. I stated as a fact that the one followed the other. I do not think either the introduction of the bill, or the laying it on the table, was the cause of the rise in gold. I can very well understand how the gold gamblers could take advantage of that to run gold up.

However, I will now proceed to give the House the facts to which I have referred. I will ask the Clerk to read the several passages which I have marked in the books I send to him.

The Clerk accordingly read the following sections of statutes of Great Britain and Ireland:

"Whereas it is expedient to enact as hereinafter provided:

"Be it enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, no person shall receive or pay for any gold coin lawfully current within the realm, any more in value, benefit, profit, or advantage, than the true lawful value which such gold coin doth or shall by its denomination import, whether such value, benefit, profit, or advantage be paid, made, or taken in lawful money, or in any note or notes, bill or bills of the governor and company of the Bank of England, or in any silver token or tokens issued by the said governor and company, or by any or all of the said means, wholly or partly, or by any other means, device, shift, or contrivance whatever; and every person who shall offend herein shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor.

"And he it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no person shall by any means, device, shift, or contrivance whatsoever, receive or pay any note or notes, bill or bills of the governor and company of the Bank of England for less than the amount of lawful money expressed therein, and to be thereby made payable, except only lawful discount on such note or bill as shall not be expressed to be payable on demand; and every person who shall offend herein shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor."

"VI. Provided always, and he it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force and until the 25th day of March, 1812, and no longer." (24th July, 1811.)

"Whereas an act passed in the fifty-first year of the reign of his present Majesty entitled 'An act for making more effectual provision for preventing the current gold coin of the realm from being paid or accepted for a greater value than the current value of such coin; for preventing any note or bill of the governor and company of the Bank of England from being received for any smaller sum than the sum therein specified; and for staying proceedings upon any distress by tender of such notes; and whereas it is expedient that the said act should be continued and amended and extended to Ireland:

"Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, no person shall receive or pay for any gold coin lawfully current within the United Kingdom any more in value, benefit, profit, or advantage than the true lawful value which such gold coin doth or shall by its denomination import, whether such value, benefit, profit, or advantage be paid, made, or taken in lawful money, or if paid or taken in Great Britain in any note or notes, bill or bills of the governor and company of the Bank of England, or in any silver token or tokens issued by the said governor and company, or if paid or taken in Ireland in any note or notes, bill or bills of the governor and company of the Bank of Ireland, or in any silver token or tokens issued by the said last-mentioned governor and company, or by any or all of the said means, wholly or partly, or by any other means, device, shift, or contrivance whatever; and every person who shall offend herein shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall suffer six months' imprisonment, and find sureties for his or her good behavior for one year more, to be computed from the end of the said six months; and if the same person shall afterwards be convicted a second time of the like offense, such person shall, for such second offense, suffer one year's imprisonment, and find sureties for his or her good behavior for one year more, to be computed from the end of the said last-mentioned year; and if the same person shall afterwards offend against this act, and shall by due course of law be convicted of any subsequent offense, he or she shall be imprisoned for the term of two years for every such subsequent offense.

"And he it hereby further enacted, That if any person shall be convicted of receiving or paying any such gold coin, contrary to the said recited act or this act, and shall afterwards be guilty of the like offense, the clerk of the assize or clerk of the peace for the county, city, or place where such conviction was so had, shall, at the request of the prosecutor or any other person on his Majesty's behalf, certify such conviction, for which certificate two shillings and sixpence, and no more, shall be paid; and such certificate being produced in court shall be sufficient proof of such former conviction."

"And he it further enacted, That no person shall, by any means, device, shift, or contrivance whatsoever, receive or pay in Great Britain any note or notes, bill or bills of the governor and company of the Bank of England, or receive or pay in Ireland any note or notes, bill or bills of the governor and company of the Bank of Ireland, for less than the amount of lawful money expressed therein, and to be thereby made payable, except only lawful discount on such note or bill as shall not be expressed to be payable on demand; and every person who shall offend herein shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted by due course of law shall be subject to a fine of double the amount of the sum of money specified in such bill or note, and made payable thereby, and shall suffer imprisonment for a time not exceeding two months."

"X1. Provided always, and he it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force to and until three months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, and no longer." (5th May, 1812.)

"An act to continue until the 25th day of March, 1814, an act of the last session of Parliament for making more effectual provision for preventing the current gold coin of the realm from being paid or accepted for a greater value than the current value of such coin; for preventing any note or bill of the governor and company of the Bank of England, or of the governor and company of the Bank of Ireland from being received for any smaller sum than the sum therein specified; and for staying proceedings upon any distress by tender of such notes. (22d December, 1812.)

"Whereas an act was made in the last session of Parliament entitled 'An act to continue until three months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament and amend an act of the last session of Parliament for making more effectual provision for preventing the current gold coin of the realm from being paid or accepted for a greater value than the current value of such coin; for preventing any note or bill of the governor and company of the Bank of England from being received for any smaller sum than the sum therein specified; and for staying proceedings upon any distress by tender of such notes; and to extend the same to Ireland;' and whereas it is expedient that the said act should be continued:

"Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, That the said act shall be, and the same is hereby, continued until the 25th day of March, 1814."

"An act to revive and continue, during the continuance of any act imposing any restriction on the governor and company of the Bank of England with respect to payments in cash, an act of the fifty-second year of his present Majesty, for making more effectual provision for preventing the current gold coin of the realm from being paid or accepted for a greater value than the current value of such coin; and for other purposes therein mentioned. (4th May, 1814.)

"Whereas an act was made in the fifty-second year of his present Majesty entitled 'An act to continue until three months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament and amend an act of the last session of Parliament for making more effectual provision for preventing the current gold coin of the realm from being paid or accepted for a greater value than the current value of such coin; for preventing any note or bill of the governor and company of the Bank of England from being received for any smaller sum than the sum therein specified; and for staying proceedings upon any distress by tender of such notes; and to extend the same to Ireland;' and whereas the said act was continued by an act of the last session of Parliament until the 25th day of March, 1814; and whereas it is expedient that the said act should be revived and further continued:

"Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said act shall be, and the same is hereby, revived from the said 25th day of March, 1814, and be further continued from thence during the continuance of any act imposing any restriction on the governor and company of the Bank of England with respect to payments in cash."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for the reading of these acts, not for the purpose of making them the subject of any remarks of my own, but to place before the House the facts, lest there should remain in the minds of any portion of the House the idea that the bill which I introduced was a proposition to legislate without consideration and without examination; was an absurd bill which was justly subject to the jeers of wittlings out of Congress. My bill was formed precisely upon the principle of the acts of Parliament which have been read, adapting the provisions to the condition of this country. There were one or two amendments which I thought ought to be made, more particularly to except the contracts of the Government from the operation of one of its provisions. Hence, instead of presuming to act upon my own judgment, I asked that the bill should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means for deliberate consideration. Yet a hornet's nest was stirred up about the gold-rooms; some of our friends here were stung, and acting without consideration, believing that a most unheard-of measure had been introduced, they precipitately killed the bill, without a word of it being understood.

Now, sir, I do not say that that bill, if passed, would have been effectual to cure the evils against which it was directed; but I thought the measure worthy of consideration, inasmuch as the English Parliament, under precisely similar circumstances, in a most arduous and difficult war, had four times enacted a bill of a similar nature, and had continued it not only through the war, but until 1823, the period of the resumption of specie payments in Great Britain. I do not say, sir, that that measure in England was an entire cure of the evil which it sought to remove; for such is not history. But it was a great palliation of the evil; and instead of gold reaching 250, it stopped at the rate which it had attained, and when that law was made perpetual, gold sunk to six above par, and before long—eight years before the resumption of specie payments—it was but two and a half above par; and three or four years before the resumption it was at par. Now, sir, I thought it worthy of consideration whether a similar measure might not have a similar effect here.

Certainly I should never have complained on my own account of the action of the House in this matter; but I did deem it due to gentlemen who acted with me, and whom I have seen assailed in print for their vote on this subject, as being an ignorant and unwitting one, that I should show that the great statesmen of England introduced these very provisions into a bill in 1811 as an experiment, and found them to operate so well that they reenacted them in 1812, and again in 1813, and finally in 1814 made them perpetual. Those provisions might not have had the same effect here; but I thought it possible that they might, and I could think of no other means of reaching the evil. I have shown that my friends were justified by their knowledge of history and legislation, by their acquaintance with the wisdom of the ablest men that ever lived in England, in voting against the summary execution of the bill which was then before the House, and that those wittlings abroad who are so profoundly foolish on most things about which they write knew but little, and were learning but little wisdom either from history or experience when they treated this subject in the manner in which they did. I have introduced these acts for that, and nothing else; for I have no complaint to make of the action of the House. I did think, however, that it might be an act of benevolence to let the shallow sciolists know what big fools they had made of themselves. They may not learn anything, and I do not undertake to say that they will; but they have the opportunity.

But let it not be thought that I intend to urge this resolution, (for I have promised my friend here to withdraw it,) or to press any future action on the subject by the House. I would not willingly again throw my excellent friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] into convulsions, or the House into epileptic fits. No, sir; let it stand as it is; and, in the mean time, let this conspiracy go on, making sad havoc of the best interests of this nation, compelling the poor man and the rich to pay three prices for all the necessities of life, compelling the Government to pay three prices for all its supplies and munitions of war, and swelling the amount of the public debt, while we sit here, bound, helpless, trembling before the shoddy descendants of the sweat-cloth tribe of money-changers who were scourged from the temple.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a single word in correction of what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I know that he did not intend to misrepresent the facts, but on one important point his statements are inaccurate.

The gentleman stated that the House had voted upon that resolution before it was printed, and before a single member had become acquainted with its provisions. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Washington Chronicle of that morning contained the bill in full, and that in the brief remarks I had to make about it I read from the Chronicle several of its sections, among which were the following:

"2. That a dollar note issued by the Government, declared lawful money and legal tender, is declared of equal value for all purposes as gold and silver coin of like denomination.

"3. That a contract made payable in coin may be payable in legal-tender United States notes, and that no difference in sale or value shall be allowed between them."

And I may remark here, somewhat parenthetically, that these provisions at once negatived and condemned the law of the United States requiring duties on imports to be paid in gold.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Maine will allow me to say a word. I have said already in my remarks that I believed my bill needed some amendment, and that for that purpose I wanted it to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I stated explicitly that I wanted the proposition carefully revised.

Mr. BLAINE. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania intended to correct those provisions. I only quote them now to show the crude character of the bill as originally introduced, and to show the gentleman that the House understood it when it tabled the measure by so decisive a vote.

In regard to the specific line of the gentleman's argument to-day, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I have read English history on this subject with different conclusions from those so confidently expressed by him. My impression is that the judgment of the British people, both contemporaneous and subsequent, was and is, that such prohibitory statutes as the gentleman has cited had no favorable effect upon the price of gold. That they did not have a prejudicial and disastrous effect is due to the existence of other powerful causes in England, whose operation and effect were most beneficial. Those causes for the decline and continued low price of gold are found, sir, in the fact that the British Parliament raised by taxation half, and sometimes more than half, of the vast amount annually expended in her gigantic struggle with Napoleon Bonaparte; and British arms were at the same time blessed with a series of brilliant and decisive victories. Indeed, the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, somewhat unconsciously perhaps, admits the whole force of my position on this point; for he states that eight years before the English people resumed specie payment, in 1823, the premium on gold had fallen to a mere nominal rate. Yes, sir, I admit it; and I ask the gentleman what brought it there? Unconsciously, as I have said, the gentleman named the precise date of the battle of Waterloo, and the British victory on that memorable field was the cause of gold ruling low in London in 1815. By the battle of Waterloo England's supremacy was established; she had broken and beaten all coalitions against her, and was confessedly mistress of land and sea. It was her proud military position and her resolute system of finance that thus raised the value of her bonds and brought down the price of gold. It was not her prohibitory legislation at all; and no intelligent English historian has ever stated that it was.

Let us, sir, imitate England in raising our credit by wise legislation here, and by continued victories in the field. If we could raise half of our expenses by taxation, and could add to our many triumphs on land and sea a Waterloo victory over the hosts of the rebellion, we should need no such legislation as the gentleman has proposed to keep down the price of gold. When we reach that happy period of final triumph the gentleman's bill, if enacted, might prove harmless; but until then its manifest effect can be only injurious to the cause it seeks to serve.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not rise to discuss the provisions of the bill. I have already disclaimed all such intention. The gentleman has therefore mistaken me, as he has also mistaken in reference to the universal judgment of the British nation. I should like to know how the British debt reached £4,000,000,000 if one half was raised by taxes and one half by loans? I say that if we were raising by taxation the interest upon our public debt, and the world were satisfied of that fact, there would be no necessity of raising anything more by taxation of the people. That is not the difficulty. The confidence of the people in the Government remains unchanged. The difficulty is in the Government being compelled to buy gold, and to go abroad to the gold gamblers, who say that they hold so much money, and that the Government shall not have it unless it pays a high premium for it. I will not go back to our legislation on the subject; but I feel that England never had so absurd a law as to pay one part in gold and another part in Bank of England notes.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the gentleman whether the bonds negotiated by England upon the Continent were not payable in gold?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know.

Mr. BLAINE. Every one of them negotiated upon the Continent was payable in gold, both principal and interest. Every one negotiated at the Hague, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and elsewhere upon the Continent, was negotiated upon the gold basis exclusively.

Mr. STEVENS. She, of course, could not pay their Bank of England notes. She had to borrow money, and they were themselves a loan. I know that Austria pursued the same course that we have done, part payable in gold, and the rest in paper, and that in consequence her paper money stood, in 1828, just as ours does to-day, as 250 to 100. That I know, for I have examined into the subject.

As I have said before, I do not rise up for any other purpose than to put my views on record, as I have done.

Mr. BROOKS rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his resolution?

Mr. STEVENS. I have not heard what the gentleman from New York desires.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to speak five or six minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I will allow it to remain before the House.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] not only before this House but before the country, gives the highest importance to everything he does in reference to financial questions, more especially to the delicate relation of gold to paper money; and hence as the agitation he has created this morning is calculated to have effect upon an over-sensitive money market, he makes it necessary for us to correct any errors into which he may have fallen.

Mr. STEVENS. I have stated distinctly already, at the beginning and close of my remarks, that I designed to have no action on the subject.

Mr. BROOKS. I am glad of that. It affords some source of satisfaction.

But, permit me to say, while I am up, that when the gentleman alludes to the history of England as an example of financial action for us, he must take into consideration the difference which exists between our currency and our continental position and that of England, or else he will be led astray. In the history of British legislation on the subject of gold and paper he certainly finds precedents for the bad bill he here introduced, while he will find in France, throughout her revolutionary history, precedents which if followed here would be utterly destructive of currency, property, labor, and capital. The worst kind of anti-gold or paper laws are on the records of France, and the worst sort of laws as to legal tender, which I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania would never ask this House to adopt. Neither British nor French financial precedents can be useful to us, save to warn us from the rocks on which they were often wrecked.

And now, as to this history of England, there are three differences between us, which suggest themselves to me at the moment, and to which I ask the attention of the gentleman and of the House. The first is, that the notes of the Bank of England were accepted at the custom-houses and in the payment of duties throughout all Great Britain, making no unnecessary or extraordinary demand for gold, while here in this country a lively demand is constantly created by the action of the Federal Government in making gold and silver alone receivable at the custom-houses. Our bank notes are refused, while the Bank of England notes, I repeat, paid all duties in any of the ports of England, Ireland, or Scotland, and then these became as good as gold or silver.

Another great difference between us and England, and in consequence of which gold rises high here, while gold in England was low throughout the twenty odd years of the suspension of specie payment, was this great fact, that during all that time, or almost all of it, what is called the balance of trade was very decidedly in favor of England. England was the great export country. She had the carrying trade, more or less, throughout the whole world. The commerce of the earth was hers, while France, and other continental nations under French dominion, were altogether excluded therefrom. The manufactures of England were exported not only to Russia, and Austria, and Prussia, but throughout Spain and all the East. The consequence was, that during the greater part of the period of the suspension of specie payment the whole world was more or less indebted to Great Britain, and gold was rushing into England to pay for her surplus manufactures and exports. But that is not our history. I have not the figures before me this moment, but as near as I can recollect the financial history of New York for the past year (1864) made up to the 1st of January, I am substantially accurate when I state that our imports and exports were two to one against us, reckoning in gold and silver. Our dry goods imports alone, freight and duty unadded, were about two hundred million dollars in gold, and our exports only $100,000,000 in gold; so that any effort by law to forcibly regulate or control the market for gold, in view of the difference of exchange and the balance of trade, would only exasperate an already over-sensitive mercantile community, and raise the price of gold rather than assuage the demand.

Another great difference between us and Great Britain, and this is the third, is, that throughout nearly the whole of those twenty odd years of the suspension of specie payments the circulation of the Bank of England was limited almost, and in some fair proportion, to the specie or bullion in its vaults. The managers of the Bank of England, not always wise, very often unwise, were wise nevertheless in a curtailment of the circulation of the Bank of England notes as much as possible throughout that long period of suspension, while our policy from the beginning to the end has been an increase of the currency, an expansion of the currency, and the creation and manufacture of paper money of all kinds and characters, in quantities unknown to the world since the days of John Law and of the French assignats. The result of this excessive expansion of the currency is that this is the dearest market in the world to which things can be sent from abroad for sale, and hence, as luxuries are tempted here by paper, gold must be sent abroad to pay for them.

These are facts to which I wish to call the attention of the country, and the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to show what will be the effect of a gold bill like his in this country, based upon any logic of facts derived from the Old World.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is arguing the main question, which I carefully avoided.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand that, but I want to show to the gentleman and to the country that the gold legislation of England would not be wise legislation here, and could not be wise legislation for a country so differently situated as ours is, nor do I think it possible to ordain by statute law the price of gold in this country. I do not believe that any penal laws whatsoever of ours can reach the dealers in gold. As I have before said in the House and in another debate, gold next to God is omnipotent in the land, above all law, above all sovereigns, and far beyond the reach of this or any other Congress whatsoever. Indeed, all those attempts which were made in Great Britain to regulate the price of gold were made in vain, as has been said by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] they had no practical effect whatsoever over the people of England, or over the commerce of England, except to increase the value of gold and increase illegal traffic to such an extent that at one period the light guineas of England actually passed in public for more than the heavy guineas of England, in consequence of such legislation.

Let me say to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that this high price of gold is a necessity of our position. I regret it; we all regret it; we all suffer from it. There is no consumer of any article whatsoever who does not pay the penalty of this high price of gold. But in my judgment no violent legislation, no threats of penal laws, will do aught but aggravate the price of gold, and increase the speculation. And if imprisonment, or even death, as was sometimes the case in France, are suspended over the speculators in gold, these transactions of commerce would then be turned into the hands of some new species of man, like our bounty-jumpers, and needy, profligate, reckless men, without responsibility, who would demand and receive high premiums for the risks which they were encountering in evading the law. Our true way to reduce the price of gold is to stop the inflation of the currency. There is no other way, in my judgment, certainly none so effectual as that.

However, I rose only from a misapprehension of the purpose of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I probably should not have risen if I had known that he intended to press for no legislation. I rose only to express my objection to any violent attempt to legislate against this omnipotence of gold, by which we would but aggravate the very evil of which we all complain.

Mr. STEVENS. I said when I was up before that I would not enter into the merits of this question, although the country will doubtless be obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] for having done so in his argument.

I do not believe, however, that the high price of gold is a necessity of our position. It arises, I think, from our vicious legislation. But excuse me from rambling from the point before the House. As I told you before, I will not detain the House, but will withdraw my resolution after my colleague [Mr. BROOMALL] has made what remarks he desires to submit.

Mr. BROOMALL. I opposed the introduction of this resolution upon the same principle that I opposed all such legislation at the last session, because I believe that while the action of Congress would not have the effect expected by my learned colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] yet it would have a mischievous effect by raising the price of the commodity which he proposes to lower by it.

I do not propose at this time to enter into any argument upon this subject, but simply to say that I have devoted some attention to this question since the introduction of the gentleman's first bill, and I intend to take the earliest opportunity of demonstrating to the House, as far as my feeble powers will allow, that the price of gold is just as much beyond the reach of Congress, so far as any lowering of it is concerned, with the laws of trade operating in their present manner, as would be the regulating of the courses of the planets in their orbits. I intend to take that opportunity, when it shall arise, to give my views upon the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, through Mr. HAY, his Private Secretary; also a message announcing that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 478) for the relief of Charles M. Pott;

An act (H. R. No. 603) to extend the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods therein named from public stores;

An act (H. R. No. 618) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith return to your honorable body, in which it originated, a "joint resolution to correct certain clerical errors in the internal revenue act" without my approval.

My reason for doing so is, that I am informed that this joint resolution was proposed during the last moments of the last session of Congress, for the purpose of correcting certain errors of reference in the internal revenue act, which were discovered on an examination of an official copy procured from the State Department a few hours only before the adjournment. It passed the House and went to the Senate, where a vote was taken upon it; but, by some accident, it was not presented to the President of the Senate for his signature.

Since the adjournment of the last session of Congress, other errors of a kind similar to those which this resolution was designed to correct have been discovered in the law, and it is now thought most expedient to include all the necessary corrections in one act or resolution.

The attention of the proper committee of the House has, I am informed, been already directed to the preparation of a bill for this purpose.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.
EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 6, 1865.

The SPEAKER announced that the first question was upon reconsidering the vote by which the House passed the joint resolution referred to in the message of the President.

The joint resolution was then read.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, the message of the President of the United States, together with the joint resolution, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announcing that they had passed the House bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866," with an amendment, in which they requested the concurrence of the House.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 342, making appropriations for public buildings in the Territories of Colorado, Nevada, Dakota, Idaho, Arizona, and Montana, that bill having been postponed till the 19th of December, after the morning hour.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move the further postponement of that bill until the first Tuesday in February.

The motion was agreed to.

WRITS OF ERROR AND APPEALS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to facilitate judicial proceedings on writs of error and appeals; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may resume the consideration of the President's message. There are one or two gentlemen who desire to be heard on that subject, and I do not know that there will be any better opportunity.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to yield for a few moments. I desire to move to take up House bill No. 622, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot give way for that purpose.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DONNELLY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. CRESWELL. Mr. Chairman, the result of the recent election expresses the deliberate purpose of the American people that slavery shall be abolished. Slowly and painfully, but yet surely, has the nation advanced to that determination.

It was the settled conviction, often expressed, of a large majority of the framers of our Constitution that slavery was an unmitigated evil, to be tolerated for a time only, that it might be the better abrogated. But in later times certain of the political priesthood, seduced by the Circean lures of a new deity, quarreled with an opinion which, however sound in morals and politics, must, they said, be denounced as false in principle, because it set at naught the craft of those who made silver shrines, and prevented the spread of the worship of that great goddess whose snowy robes the zephyrs had wafted down from Jupiter. These new guides soon informed the country that an irresistible sense of duty compelled them to undertake the reform of an error so palpable and mischievous. Selecting Whitney's laborious invention as the emblem of the most advanced civilization, they inscribed thereon an epitome of their improved creed in these words: "Slavery is right and ordained of God. Whoever will not accept this faith is an infidel. Let him be accursed;" and when they had done so, much people cried with one voice for the space of many years, "Great is Cotton of South Carolina!"

Vanquished by their fears; trembling lest harm might come to the Republic; willing to accept any system, however monstrous, if only the Union might be preserved, men everywhere gave way to the exactions of slavery, until it ruled with imperious sway Congress, court, and President alike, and held at its beck and call all the power of a mighty Government. But not content with its absolute authority; not content that it had conquered in almost every struggle with freedom, and by sanction of law could stretch its iron scepter over half the States and all the Territories; in an hour big with the fate of the western world slavery summoned its hosts to arms, hurled defiance full in the face of the starled nation, and insolently boasted that by the power of the sword it would soon plant its throne upon the ruins of the Republic.

Thousands who would fain have spared slavery, so long as it was peaceful, were compelled to take up arms for their country when slavery became belligerent; but even then they were unwilling that the monster, who had incited to "foul revolt," should be unaviled. From every section of the land where loyalty still held sway, the cry at first went up, "Down with treason and rebellion, but spare the institutions of the South;" and when they said "institutions" they meant slavery. They had been so long accustomed to hear the "peculiar institution" lauded as altogether harmless and immaculate, that they would not believe that it could ever appear in any other garb than that of peaceful industry. In their eyes the slave, sitting in the ashes of his servitude, was the "lars et penates" of every slave-owner's household, and it was necessary to protect the "right of property" in order to preserve the sanctity of the homes of "our southern brethren." While thus fondly dreaming of conducting war upon strictly fraternal principles, the first Bull Run was fought and lost, and "our southern brethren" celebrated their triumph by snaking finger-rings and drinking-cups out of the bones of the Yankee barbarians whom they had slain in battle; and the chivalrous Beauregard, swaggering like any blatant bully beneath the doubtful honors of his accidental victory, could find in his soldier's vocabulary no words but those of insult and brutality wherewith to respond to the simple request of a heart-broken sister who had asked to be permitted to recover an honored brother's dead body for the purpose of Christian burial. Can you recall an instance where a drop of water or a morsel of food was given to one of our unfortunate brothers who fell into the hands of the enemy on that field because he was a conservative and would save slavery? Did a single hero of all who were stricken down in the bloody battles before Richmond, or in the campaign of the second Bull Run, or at South Mountain, or Antietam, receive from a rebel foe one generous act of kindness because of his moderation on the subject of slavery? I venture to say, no. With the rebels nothing has been known but determined, inveterate, revengeful, malignant, savage war. Their conduct, persisted in with every aggravation of cruelty, at last forced the most unwilling minds to the conclusion that it was folly to continue the effort to put down armed rebellion by moral suasion.

Satisfied that they were engaged in a struggle of life or death the people could no longer deny that if they would not be destroyed they must inflict every injury upon their enemy consistent with the laws of war. The stern necessity of self-defense first secured a reluctant support to the President's proclamation of emancipation. Momentous considerations of political economy, morality, and religion, though for a long time held at bay, since then have been gradually forcing themselves upon the public mind, and steadily widening and strengthening the grounds of opposition to slavery. After two years' trial, such as nations are rarely subjected to, the people have risen to a clearer sense of their duty, and now desire to dispel all legal doubts, and to make that proclamation good for all time, and universal in its application, by amendment of the Constitution.

Whatever may have been heretofore our obligations, express or implied, to tolerate slavery, and not to expose its true character, we are now absolved from all such obligations by its own wickedness. Slavery's oath of fealty to the Union has been falsified by its treason. We are no longer bound to protect it from harm or shield it from scrutiny. It is our foe, and in order that we may ascertain whether it can ever become our friend it is now our duty to lay bare its whole life and record.

What, then, is slavery? The picture would be too crowded, were I to attempt to portray it as it has existed in all the States of this Union. I shall speak only for Maryland, a slave State for more than two and a quarter centuries. I am a native of Maryland. I have lived all my days within her limits, and I hope when my appointed time shall come to be buried beside my forefathers, who, for generations back, sleep upon her bosom. I love my State as ardently as any man can love the spot of his nativity. I love her for much of her past history, to me a glorious record of manly deeds and noble heroism. But more than all do I love her, because, though in these latter days, tempted, deceived, almost betrayed by some of her own most trusted sons, who, after making her drunk with passion, strove to lead her off into rebellion, and to array her children, brother against brother, in deadly strife, yet I now have the glorious assurance that she has risen above these pernicious influences; that she has expelled her mischief, and purged "off the baser fire victorious;" that, "clothed and in her right mind," though still pale and suffering from her wounds, self-inflicted in her terrible folly, she has come in good time to renew her faith once before pledged to the sacred covenant of our Constitution, and has told the story of her victory, thus: "O Freedom! I have abjured all association with the foul superstition of slavery. My sacrifice I now lay upon thy altar. Here are the chains which once held in bondage eighty-seven thousand human beings. I have stricken them off with my own hands, and throughout my fair domain there is not a being in the image of God who is not free."

Thus slavery in Maryland is of the past. Let our statutes and law reports, still uncleansed, tell what it was.

The Legislature by the act of 1715, chapter forty-four, section twenty-three, declared it to be the law "that all negroes and other slaves already imported, or hereafter to be imported into this province, and all children now born or hereafter to be born of such negroes and slaves, shall be slaves during their natural lives;" and the Maryland Code, volume one, article sixty-six, section one, reaffirms that declaration. The full import of this simple provision is not seen until you are told that every negro was presumed to be a slave; that no negro or mulatto was admitted as evidence in any matter depending in any court, or before any justice of the peace, where any white person was concerned; and that the fact of a negro's going at large and acting as free, or not being claimed by an owner, was not admissible as evidence of freedom. Nothing could relieve a negro from any claim set up by a white person, unless he could establish his freedom, or the freedom of his ancestor, by the grant or devise of his former owner. (Code, volume one, article thirty-seven, section one, and article sixty-six, section forty-two.) A slave could have no rights adverse to his master. He could neither sue personally nor by prochein ami, nor be sued, nor acquire any rights under a deed which either a court of law or equity could enforce. Nor could he enter into any binding contract with his master, (4 H. & J. 507, 9 G. & J. 19.) The only standing which a negro, claimed as a slave, could have in any court of civil jurisdiction was as a petitioner for freedom; but even in that case he was such a legal nonentity that he could not make an affidavit in support of his prayer, while the most exclusive and arbitrary rules of evidence were brought to bear against him, so as to confine him to strict record proof.

The master was absolute lord; the slave and the slave's posterity were abject bondmen. The master had not only a right to the labor and service, but he had an absolute property in the flesh and blood and bones of his slave, and, if a female, of her issue. (Sutton vs. Crain, 10 G. and J. 458.) Thus a bequest for life of the use of a female slave vested in the legatee a property in the issue, born during the existence of the life estate, for the life of such issue; and the issue of a female slave for a term of years, or for one year only, was a slave for life. The slave could sustain none of those relations which give life all its charms. He could not say my home, my father, my mother, my wife, my child, my body. It is for God to judge whether he could say my soul. The law pronounced him a chattel, and these are not the rights or attributes of chattels.

To seek his freedom by flight made the slave a felon; and, as if to reward barbarity and place a premium on human blood, the slave-owners, when they made law in Maryland, wrote it down:

"If any runaway slave shall resist the person who attempts to arrest him, and such slave happens to be slain for refusing to surrender himself, such killing shall be deemed justifiable; and any slave so killed shall be paid for by the State, his value to be ascertained by two impartial and reputable men, not of kin to the owner, who shall be appointed by a justice of the peace, and sworn to value such slave at his fair value, and who shall certify their valuation to such justice, who shall certify such valuation, oath, and appointment, to the comptroller, who shall thereupon issue his warrant to the treasurer to pay the same."—Code, vol. 1, art. 65, sec. 11.

That provision stands upon the statute-book of Maryland to-day. The last Legislature refused to repeal it, because, they said, it was necessary to preserve the system. "Thou shalt not kill," thundered God from Sinai. Cursed, then, be the system that cannot endure save by wanton homicide. It reads, "and any slave so killed shall be paid for." Paid for by whom? By the slave-owners? No. By all the people of Maryland, of whom 503,000 were non-slaveholders and less than 14,000 were slaveholders. But patience! the last few months have changed all that. This famous section eleven of article sixty-six of the Code of Public General Laws, which justified murder and extorted tribute from the despised mechanic and the toiling laborer to pay the wealthy slave-owner for the negro whom he, or his myrmidon, had happened to slay, has been deprived of its death-dealing virus. It is no longer the law; it is but the shameful record of an overthrown tyranny.

But from this galling servitude was there no deliverance? Could not the faithful and devoted slave, who had been obedient unto his master in singleness of heart as unto Christ; who had aided in supporting the burdens of the family; had felt all its sorrows, and shared in his humble way in all its joys; who had nursed the master's children one by one, and had borne them "on his back a thousand times;" who had fondly watched each stalwart son as he grew up to man's estate, and gave him his blessing as he went out from the old homestead into the battle of life; who had toiled on, adding to the master's wealth from year to year until the gray hairs, gathering upon the temples of master and slave alike (for time, like God, has no respect of persons) had admonished them that their days of active life were almost numbered—could not such a slave (and there are such, for I have seen them,) be granted his liberty? Could not he be made a freeman, and be allowed to sit in his own cabin during the evening of his days, and gather his wife and children about him and call it home? Such a question would have been deemed an insult in the days of our fathers. They were humane. They made a law and confirmed it over and over again, that the slave could be manumitted. From the beginning of our State history, they were accustomed to grant freedom as the best of all gifts to the meritorious bondman. So liberal were they, that besides the freedmen, whom they prevailed upon to return to Africa and settle in the colony of Liberia, there were 83,942 free colored people still among us in 1860—a number almost equal to that of the slaves.

These free colored people, laborious and inoffensive, peaceful and unobtrusive, with no political rights, yet yielding implicit obedience to the laws, which in turn secured them in their persons and property—these people were marked for destruction by these modern partisans of slavery. They had determined that Maryland, in despite of all the honored traditions and Christian sentiments of her people, should be devoted to perpetual slavery, and that every interest, no matter how great or vital, that stood in the way of their designs, should be sacrificed. They dominated everywhere, and at their bidding the Legislature passed an act of Assembly (1860, chapter two hundred and thirty-two,) presenting to the free colored population of the State the unrelenting alternative of banishment or slavery. So shocking to humanity, so horrible in its consequences, was this atrocious iniquity, that even they dared not attempt to enforce it without first securing the approval of a popular vote. To this end they submitted their scheme to the trial by ballot in eleven counties, and endeavored to cajole the honest masses into its support; but the people turned with loathing from a measure so utterly unjust, and recorded their condemnation of it by overwhelming majorities. And so this infamous project for the enslavement of all the free of a helpless race failed, and failed signally.

But the slave-owners did not abandon their purpose. Ten years before they had made a constitution for Maryland, into which they had incorporated these provisions, side by side:

"The Legislature shall not pass any law abolishing the relation of master and slave as it now exists in this State."

"No person shall be imprisoned for debt."

With one hand they riveted still more strongly the shackles of the slave; with the other they opened the prison doors of the debtor. With one breath they declared that the white man never should be a slave, and with the next that the black man never should be a freeman. They abolished one relic of barbarism and perpetuated another; and in this they were working for themselves, for while they owned the negroes they owed the debts.

Having, as they believed, secured slavery from the assaults of the people, who were becoming more and more in favor of emancipation, they did not waste a thought upon the inconsistency which they had thus recorded. But when, in 1860, they found that during the last decade the free negroes had increased from 74,723 to 83,942, and that the slaves had decreased from 90,368 to 87,189, they saw that, if they would perpetuate their sway, they must either cease selling the increase of their slaves to the South, or stop all manumissions. Once more in the history of slavery, humanity was trampled under foot by avarice, and they chose, of course, the latter alternative. Forth with they again invoked the aid of the Legislature, and that assembly, ever obedient to their summons, was not slow to respond. This band of most skillful political prestidigitators, after manipulating the whole body of our statutes for months under the direction of their master, suddenly threw down to the people the present code, which they declared by solemn legislative act contained the entire revised statute law of the State; and to make good that declaration, they repealed all laws and parts of laws not contained therein. When the people came to examine this grand treasure-house of legal lore, they found, under the heading Manumission, printed in large letters, but very little of the old law left. Two sections only remained, of which the first said, "No slave shall henceforth be manumitted," and the second, "Any free negro before the age of eighteen may become a slave for life." This was manumission with a vengeance. This was a piece of legislative plesantry that for eighty-seven thousand men, women, and children, converted all the future into eternal night. But they did not stop there. They fortified their joke by penalties, and passed other laws making it criminal for any owner of a slave to permit such slave to go at large, or hire himself, or for any person to make any contract with a slave for his services. These provisions finished the business, and condemned the slave and all his posterity to interminable bondage, or starvation, under the penalty of death, if seen attempting to escape; and made every master, in spite of the dictates of his judgment or the stings of his conscience, a slaveholder, living or dying.

All this was done when slavery was omnipotent in Maryland, when it brooded over our legislative assemblies and courts of justice like death, and with its "mace petrific" remorselessly smote down into political obscurity every man who would not strangle the better instincts of his nature and applaud their merciless code as the perfection of wisdom and loving-kindness. Little did these conspirators against the human race think that they were but God's instruments for the downfall of their own cherished system. So soon has the retribution come, that had they listened even in the hour of their imagined triumph they might have heard the quickening footsteps of outraged justice, at last tortured into action and forced to assume the part of the avenger, hurrying onward to interpose her sword between the pitiless and exacting master and his wretched and hopeless slave.

The deliverer came, and at the sound of her voice every shackle fell and the slave was transformed into a freeman and a soldier. Ten thousand of Maryland's black men have joined our armies. How worthily they have worn their uniform of blue and borne the standard of the Republic onward to the gates of death, let the stricken field of Olustee, and the war-blasted hills around Petersburg, and the blood-baptized parapets of Fort Gillmore answer. The only eulogium they need is what history, scorning to falsify, shall write down with her iron pen.

If we inquire how could a Christian people be reconciled to a series of laws so cruel and despotic, the first answer that will suggest itself will be, slavery is profitable. Let us examine into that.

Maryland has an area of 11,000 square miles, with unsurpassed advantages for commerce and manufactures, with an agreeable climate and fertile soil, with valuable mineral deposits and immense supplies of timber, with ready access to the ocean, and with navigable streams traversing in almost every direction her entire eastern and southern sections. She has the great bay of the Chesapeake, stretching its full length from north to south. The Potomac river forms her southern boundary. She lies almost between the three great emporiums of the country, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore; the latter city being her own commercial center. Massachusetts, with a severer climate, a more sterile soil, and with commercial and manufacturing interests scarcely equal to those of Maryland, has an area of only 7,250 square miles. In 1790 Maryland had a total population of 319,728, and Massachusetts of 378,717, the difference being less than sixty thousand. But in the race of the next seventy years the old Bay State far outstripped "My Maryland." In 1860 Maryland had a population, the State over, of only 687,049, while Massachusetts could muster 1,231,066, and could fairly boast of more than double the wealth of Maryland.

Compare New Jersey, with but three fifths of the area of Maryland, lying almost between the same parallels of latitude, with a territory almost contiguous, and a soil of like character and capacity, with no great central city as a nucleus for her wealth and trade, and not relieved from the blighting influence of slavery until 1820; and it will appear, that though in 1790 New Jersey had a population of only 184,139, but little more than half that of Maryland, yet in 1860 she made returns of 672,035 inhabitants, only 15,000 behind Maryland, and showed her wealth to be $467,918,324, exceeding that of Maryland by more than one fourth.

But it is unnecessary to make contrasts between different States. Our own presents the most complete demonstration of the unprofitableness of slavery. Freedom has for many years past been gradually gaining on slavery in Maryland. For the last decade our State has been substantially half free and half slave. From the counties north and west of the Patapsco and Sassafras rivers nearly all the slaves had disappeared, while almost the entire slave population had been gathered to the south and east of those rivers. Down to the boundary line between slavery and freedom marched the conquering spirit of progress, carrying in her train the blessings of prosperity and industry, and there halted as peremptorily as though a fiend in the way had barred all further advance.

The free counties contained in 1850, 980,147 cultivated acres, while the slave counties had 1,747,623; but the free lands were valued at $47,851,615, while the slave lands were worth only $41,779,616. The farms in the slave counties average 143 acres, and are each worth $3,433. The free farms, averaging only 101 acres, were yet worth $4,935 each. The free land was worth $48, the slave land $23 per acre.

But the increase in population is still more marked. Exclusive of Baltimore city, there was in 1790 in the seven free counties a population of 105,457, which in 1860 had swelled to 232,301—an increase of one hundred and twenty per cent. The total population in the fourteen slave counties amounted in 1790 to 200,612, in 1860 to only 242,330—an increase of only twenty per cent. In seventy years the whole slave section had added but 41,718 to its population, while in the same time that of the entire free portion had increased 325,693. It thus appears that the increment of population in the slave counties was much less than might have been expected from natural causes alone; and that if the increase throughout the State had been only in proportion to that of the slave counties, our aggregate population in 1860 would have been only 383,674 instead of 687,049.

In 1860, the total foreign population of the State was 77,536, of which about one third, to wit, 24,248, was increase since 1850; but this immigration was confined almost exclusively to the free counties. In Cecil county, the only free county of the Eastern Shore, there were in 1860 1,343 foreigners; in the other seven counties of the same shore, all being slave counties and containing together more than five times the population of Cecil, there were in all only 641 foreigners. Not only did slavery prohibit immigration; it did worse. It condemned our own native-born citizens to banishment. In 1860 there were 137,258 native Marylanders living in the other States of the Union, while, on the other hand, we had received from the other States but 40,694, of whom by far the larger part had settled in the free counties and Baltimore city, leaving a deficit of 96,564.

Why need we look further into the record? Figures always condemn slavery, and statistics are its irreconcilable foe. Travel through our State at your leisure and you will clearly see that slavery has been a most ungrateful mistress for Maryland. It has wasted our resources, paralyzed our industry, checked our growth in wealth, population, and all substantial interests, refused ingress to the intelligent and enterprising of other States and countries, and has even driven our own young men into exile. So far as we have advanced at all we have done so in spite of slavery, and by driving it before us. And so it is everywhere. Says Cochran:

"This history of slavery knows no change. It is in all places, it has been at every epoch, an obstacle to the systematic peopling of the earth, an obstacle to the propagation of the gospel, an obstacle to the modest elevation of the inferior races, an obstacle to the progressive civilization of the superior races. The moralist calls it a crime, the historian and economist a scourge."

But Maryland has been liberated from her servitude of centuries. Her limbs, so long benumbed beneath the weight of an unendurable burden, are fast assuming the vigor of a new life. In the presence of treason and rebellion traditional prejudices could no longer steep the minds of men in forgetfulness. Startled patriotism invoked the aid of religion and humanity, and, uniting in the discharge of a sacred duty, they totally destroyed every vestige of slavery. Our new constitution on the 1st day of November last decreed freedom, unrestricted, unconditional, uncompensated, absolute, and universal throughout the State. In cordial recognition of that glorious achievement the President has proclaimed to the world that "Maryland presents the example of complete success. Maryland is secure to liberty and Union for all the future. The genius of rebellion will no more claim Maryland. Like another foul spirit, being driven out it may seek to tear her, but will woo her no more."

Already she has begun to reap the advantages of emancipation. The worthy, the industrious, and the provident are hastening to settle among us. To illustrate the practical effects of the change, I read the following extract from the Baltimore American of a late date:

"ONE OF THE RESULTS.—The abolition of slavery in Maryland is being attended with the good results the friends of emancipation expected. A steady stream of emigrants from our sister States, particularly Pennsylvania, is pouring in upon us, now that 'free labor' has become a settled fact. In every county of the State large sales of land have taken place during the past two months, and the purchasers are men who intend to settle in our midst, and who do not purchase for the sake of speculation. The worn-out and half-tilled tracts of the large slaveholder, in the hands of farmers who till their grounds by free labor—who encourage free schools, and all the accompaniments of free institutions—will soon place Maryland in the position among the free States that she should have occupied long ago. The following, from the Denton Union, published in Caroline county, is an indication of the revolution taking place: 'Mr. James G. Redden has sold his farm near the town, containing near three hundred acres, to Mr. Jacob L. Zook, of Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, for $9,000. It is a healthy and desirable residence.'

"Mr. Redden has also sold the 'Mansion Farm,' formerly the residence of the late William Jones, near Andersonstown, to Mr. J. W. Clive, of Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, but at what price we have not learned."

"Mr. Redden also sold his Burnsville farm, near the Delaware line, to Mr. Tobias Miller, of Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, containing one hundred acres, for $3,500."

"We have always understood that the land in Caroline is among the poorest in the State, and believe that the prices above specified are remarkably good. 'The Union,' in commenting on the above sales, says: 'We would advise all persons, whether residents here or elsewhere, who wish to purchase farms in this country, to do so speedily, before the price of lands goes up. They are cheap at present, but how long they will remain so, now that Maryland is a free State, no one can tell.' 'The Somerset Herald,' in an extract which we published yesterday, says that 'more land is wanted; northerners continue to visit this county, [Somerset,] looking for farms.' Well may the President say that 'the genius of rebellion will no more claim Maryland.' That day is gone forever."

We extend to all who are anxious to better their condition a most cordial invitation to come and cast in their lot with us. We have no fears of the "barbarous hordes" of the North. On the contrary we say ho! all Yankeeedom, and every other land under the sun where boys are taught, and men practice, the lesson, that honest labor is not discreditable. Send down your hardy sons, and we will greet them right heartily. We want your enterprise and capital, your strong arms, your courageous hearts, and your ever-active brains. Come on, then, Mr. Yankee, cheat us if you can; my word for it, you will not do so more than once. We shall soon learn to take care of ourselves. Meanwhile we will receive you as equals, and take the chances at a bargain. But remember, we shall impose one condition, a violation of which will work a perpetual forfeiture of all the rights and privileges ever granted you; that is, that you shall swear eternal hatred to slavery and to its offspring, the rebellion.

Gentlemen of distinguished ability have urged objections against this amendment of the Constitution which they assert are insuperable. They exclaim, "Oh, the terrible change! You will take these poor negroes from their comfortable homes, provided by the watchful care of their masters with abundant supplies of all the necessities of life, and cast them forth upon the world utterly destitute and naked. They will perish." I accept as genuine the protestation that this objection is prompted by an honest feeling of sympathy, and will endeavor to answer it as it deserves.

We must bear in mind that the negro race does not stand at as low a point in the estimation of the ethnologist as it did five years ago. At that time it was claimed that all experience in this country established the assertion that the negro could not exist without the watchful supervision of his master, and that the black race was a necessary complement of the white race in the southern States, the one furnishing the physical and the other the intellectual power. But war is as subversive of theories as it is of mere physical obstacles, and under its stern mandates life-long convictions may be stormed as easily as military positions which before were deemed impregnable. Who now will assert, in the face of the facts transpiring everywhere, that the negro cannot be made a soldier? That nonsense has been exploded by the rebels themselves, many of whom, and it is said General Lee among them, now clamor for a general arming of the slaves. If they so order it, well; men who have handled muskets do not willingly become slaves; least of all will they become again the slaves of masters whose cause, when lost, they were armed to win; nor will they win a cause which, if won, will reward their prowess with fetters. Who now will assert that the negro will at the first opportunity rush into insurrection and every excess of barbarism? Answer me fairly—who, since the negro has been permitted to bear arms, has been most distinguished for the display of the Christian virtues in the field, the former slave or the former master? When you can prove against the negro soldier the horrible atrocities of Fort Pillow, Libby prison, Belle Isle, or Andersonville, I will grant you he is a savage, and should be banished from civilized life.

I do not deny but that in this great tempest of the social elements there may be in some localities much suffering among the freedmen. So there has been perhaps to an equal amount among the white refugees. The war has imposed many and appalling hardships. They are already upon us. We must provide for them whether we adopt this amendment of the Constitution or not. But let peace be restored, revive the industrial pursuits, say to the negro, hereafter you shall work for hire, and shall receive and appropriate your own wages; and as sure as it is the law of God for the white man that truth is better than error, and freedom better than slavery, so will experience vindicate the same great principles for the black man.

This point needs no elaboration. You must either permit the blacks to be free or return them to bondage. Suppose you reenslave them after having enjoyed a taste of liberty, would they not suffer tenfold more than if they remained free? Undoubtedly they would.

In my own State the freedmen properly appreciate their position. In fact, the slaves, for the most part, knew beforehand from actual intercourse with those of their race previously manumitted what would be expected of them after their emancipation. I have heard no complaints of their idleness or dissipation. All of them with whom I have conversed seem to understand that they must work for an honest livelihood. They were never better behaved. Obedient, cheerful, and happy, they appear anxious by their good conduct to reward the efforts of those who labored to make them free. I regret nothing that I have done for them. On the contrary, I rejoice that I have been able to contribute to the restoration of the rights of humanity to a down-trodden race. When passing along through life I encounter these poor freedmen, and hear one of them say, "Master, God bless you," I feel none the worse that the prayer of a fellow-mortal, black though he be, upon whom I have aided in conferring something more of happiness, has been offered up in my behalf.

The helplessness of the blacks used to be a favorite topic of conversation among the slaveholders of Maryland, but since emancipation has been in course of development very little has been heard from them on that subject. When Jeff. Davis's statesmanship had begun to bear fruit, and a fearful suspicion had gradually dawned upon the enlightened understanding of his followers, that instead of making slavery supreme, he had simply knocked out its brains and given its carcass to the dogs, fear made them tell the truth, and we then discovered that helplessness was chargeable more to the masters than to the slaves. "Gracious Heaven!" they exclaimed, "if we lose our slaves, how shall we get along? Why, we never worked a day in our lives." And when in the course of events the loyal white people of Maryland for nearly three years had been marching their fathers and sons and brothers to the war, many of them to return no more, and when at the board of almost every loyal family the place of some loved one could be filled only by the cherished memory of a gallant soldier who had nobly died for his country, those who had suffered thus, seeing the slave-owners actually profiting by the scarcity of white labor, began to ask, Why are not the burdens of this war made equal? Why are not the slaves put into the Army and allowed to fight? At the mere asking of such grossly unconstitutional questions a wail went up from the slave-owners (except a few, to whom all honor) that rent the heavens. They cried out "Oh! spare us, spare us; our work is to be done, and our slaves must do it. Go on with the draft, and let the white men who are unable to pay commutation go to the war." But notwithstanding these most affecting entreaties, the able-bodied male slaves nearly all volunteered. After they had gone the owners were indiscreet enough to complain, because, as they said, all the strong men having been taken they would be taxed with the support of the women and children, the helpless and infirm, and they piteously asked to be relieved from so much unrequited expense and care. This alleged grievance coming to the ears of one having the power to remedy it, he at once made it known that he would relieve the owners from the charge of all the negroes whom they were unwilling to retain, and would provide for their transportation by sending a steamer to any accessible point that might be designated. Strange to relate, not one application was made for transportation. There was an instantaneous conversion of all who before complained; and like good Christians they forthwith acknowledged the obligation resting upon them to protect and provide for the imbecile creatures over whom Providence had placed them. But the most ludicrous refutation of all such complaints was given the other day. Even before the election for the adoption of the constitution had been held, the slave-owners, profiting by the signs of the times, began to ransack the statutes of the State in search of some legal device that would enable them to secure for a few years more the services of the infant slaves. Scarcely had they fished up an old apprentice law, which the lawyers told them would answer their purpose, when lo! and behold, they gathered up the little darkeys of both sexes and crowded them into all conceivable kinds of vehicles until they looked like over-populous nests of blackbirds, and then conveyed them with all possible haste before the orphan's courts and had them bound out to their former masters. Many of the owners, although the result of the election was then unknown, actually manumitted the children before the 1st of November, and had them bound immediately in order that they might deprive their parents, who were still slaves, of the right of being consulted after their emancipation as to the disposition of their own offspring.

You will not wonder at my confidence in the improvement of the negro race when I relate an incident which came under my own observation.

Our struggle for emancipation was fierce and closely contested. For a long time the result was in doubt. The soldiers' vote finally settled it in our favor by a majority of more than four hundred; but the advocates of slavery, unwilling, though fairly beaten, to surrender a field which they had held so long without dispute, did their utmost, after the election, to defeat the voice of the people, by a resort to protests, and injunctions, and writs of mandamus, and every other device which the ingenuity of counsel could invent. The Governor's proclamation, declaring the triumph of the friends of freedom, in spite of rebel votes and the "law's delay," did not reach the southern section of the State until Monday, the 31st October, when a steamer from Baltimore brought the official document. A Union meeting was held that day at Cambridge, in Dorchester county, at which it was made known, to the infinite disgust of every faithful follower of Jeff. Davis, that the next day would see Maryland a free State. I know not how the word passed; I saw no flashing beacon, nor flaming brand, nor speeding courier; but as I traveled in open carriage that night to fill an appointment next day, more than fifty miles away, it seemed as if the very air had borne the glad tidings before me. All Africa was abroad; some on horseback, some in wagons, but nearly all on foot, moving along, singing and joyful. When, later in the night, I was journeying wearily through the sighing pines, my curiosity was excited by the fact that ever and anon a bright light would suddenly burst upon me. Knowing that country people were usually at that hour a-bed, these lights were a mystery to me. Turning to my companion, I asked an explanation. He replied, "The lights you see are at the meeting-houses of the negroes, who have met for the purpose of holding watch-meetings to welcome in the 1st of November." The mystery was explained. The negroes had assembled at midnight, in their rude churches, hastily built by the roadside, in the woods, or down at the marshes, to watch for the advent of their day of jubilee, in order that they might receive their earliest experience of Heaven's priceless gift to man—thrice-blessed liberty—while on their knees before the Father of all. Surely, a people who will thus dedicate the first moments of their freedom to God are worthy to be free.

But it has been urged with great earnestness that it is not within the scope of constitutional amendment to interfere with the domestic institutions of a State; and that in no event should slavery be abolished without compensation. That the Convention which framed the Constitution did not sustain either branch of this objection will not remain in controversy if we but refer to the debates of that body.

On the 8th September, 1787, Mr. Madison moved to postpone the consideration of the proposition then pending, in order to take up the following:

"The Legislature of the United States, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem necessary, or on the application of two thirds of the Legislatures of the several States, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, which shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part thereof, when the same shall have been ratified by three fourths, at least, of the Legislatures of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, or by one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Legislature of the United States."

This is the same as the text of the main clause of article five, with an amendment afterward introduced, so as to require a convention on application of two thirds of the States, and with a few merely verbal amendments.

Mr. Hamilton seconded the motion, so that it was supported in the beginning by two of the clearest minds of the Convention.

Mr. Rutledge said he never could agree to give a power by which the articles relating to slaves might be altered by the States not interested in that property and prejudiced against it. In order to obviate this objection, the first proviso was added, in these words:

"Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses of the ninth section of the first article."

It will be observed that by its own terms this proviso ceased to operate after 1808.

When the same article again came up for consideration, on the 15th September, Mr. Sherman said he thought it reasonable that the proviso in favor of the States importing slaves should be extended so as to provide that no State should be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its equality in the Senate; and he forthwith moved to add the following, as a further proviso:

"That no State shall, without its consent, be affected in its internal police or deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Whereupon Mr. Madison said, "Begin with these special provisos, and every State will insist on them for its boundaries, exports, &c." The motion of Mr. Sherman was then negatived by a vote of three States to eight. Mr. Sherman then moved to strike out the article altogether, but this was negatived by a vote of two States to eight, and one divided. It was then that, on motion of Mr. Gouverneur Morris, the second proviso, "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," was carried without a dissenting voice. This second proviso, mark you, differed from Mr. Sherman's proposition in this only, that it omitted the words "be affected in its internal police."

Now, here is an express refusal by the Convention to impose upon the power of amendment a restriction that would have exempted the "internal police" of a State from its operation. The restriction was asked for as a concession to slavery, was opposed by Mr. Madison, and was voted down largely. It cannot be said that the South did not then desire some security in the Constitution against emancipation; for Mr. Pinckney, on three occasions, asked for just such a provision; and it was frequently urged by Mr. Rutledge, and others, that North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, would demand even more, and would never agree to the Constitution unless their right to import slaves be untouched. In regard to all which demands and threats the sentiment of the Convention could not be better shown than by citing the ever-memorable remark of Mr. Madison that "he thought it wrong to admit in the Constitution the idea that there could be property in men." (Elliot's Debates, volume 5, pages 357, 457, 478; 487, 531, and 551.) It is but fair to infer from the admitted opposition of a large majority of the framers of the Constitution to slavery that they intended that the country should ultimately get rid of that evil by a resort to the power of amendment, and more especially is that inference justified when the further fact is considered, that the Convention actually refused to except "the internal police of the States" from the operation of the clause of amendment.

If, then, the power of amendment extends to the abolition of slavery, and that it does is too clear to admit of a suspicion of a doubt, with what propriety can any slaveholder ask for compensation? They entered the Union with a full knowledge of the existence of that power, and they held their slaves afterward subject to the right of the people of the United States in accordance with the forms prescribed to prohibit human bondage. How then can the slaveholders complain of injustice if the people shall choose to exercise their notorious privilege of amendment? But the case is infinitely worse when we advert to the many efforts at conciliation made in the beginning of the rebellion, and find that before the insolence of the slave power had culminated in actual war the Congress proposed, by the necessary majority, an amendment to the Legislatures of the States, whereby the people were to be deprived of all power of interference with slavery in the States by amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and that this proposition, which, if accepted, would have been a perpetual guarantee, was scornfully rejected. Nothing would satisfy the propagandists of slavery but war, terrible war. And now, after the nation has been compelled in defense of its life to expend its treasure by thousands of millions, and sacrifice hundreds of its best and bravest on almost every hill-top and in almost every valley of the South, who is so craven as to speak of compensation for slaves when their emancipation was made necessary by the rebellion of their masters?

I have heard it said of the rebels, "Woe them with gifts. Pay them for their losses." Is it meant that we shall load our already heavily burdened constituents with one more subsidy that defeated traitors may not suffer the penalties of their own acts? Is it meant that we shall charm them back to loyalty by paying them the money of a people whom in striving to ruin they have ruined themselves? I would rather say with King Henry of Bolingbroke,

"Shall our coffers then
Be emptied, to redeem a traitor home?
Shall we buy treason? and indent with foes,
When they have lost and forfeited themselves?
No, on the barren mountains let them starve;
For I shall never hold that man my friend,
Whose tongue shall ask me for one penny cost
To ransom home revolted!" [Davis and his crew.]

Who is so weak as to believe that the rebels can be appeased by concessions to slavery, or that the war can be ended otherwise than by destroying their military power? Have they ever given us reason to entertain any such expectations? Their president, their congress, the chiefs of their armies, all of their officials, high or low, who have spoken upon the subject, have always insisted that they will tolerate but one plan of adjustment, namely, that which provides for separation and disunion. Where is the evidence that the rebels will stop the war and return to the Union if we will not destroy slavery? I challenge its production. It nowhere exists. The issue is sharply defined between the rebellion and the United States. On the one side is disunion for the sake of slavery; on the other is freedom for the sake of the Union. In the beginning of the war the rebels, to justify their resort to arms, seized the priestess of prophecy, and compelled her to adopt the sentiment that the Union could not continue with the States part slave and part free. They construed the words literally, and then, by their own voluntary acts, verified the prophecy as they interpreted it. They have demonstrated that the conflicting systems of free and slave labor cannot be reconciled under a republican form of government, but rather that they will develop into political antipathies, which will ultimately, like smoldering, but inextinguishable fires, burst into the full blaze of civil war.

Others may doubt and fear, but I believe that slavery is doomed. In my judgment, if the people of the southern confederacy, so called, were made independent to-morrow they could not preserve their favorite institution. If this Congress were to promise to protect it for them, could that promise be redeemed? Could you ever again enforce a fugitive slave law? No human power can again so far stifle the voice of nature as to hush into submission the denunciations of slavery, which rise like exhalations from all parts of the land. Civilization everywhere speaks for liberty. Russia, by her grand act of emancipation, has banished serfdom from Europe. England, France, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, and Portugal, have all crossed the ocean to liberate the bondman. Less than seven millions of slaves remain within the bounds of Christendom; and for four millions of these we stand responsible in the sight of God and man. Knowing all this, the enlightened, determined, and irrepressible sentiment of the nation cries aloud, "Away with slavery, away with slavery!" So long as we hesitate and delay this great work we can have no peace. Whether we would or not, we must establish freedom if we would exterminate treason. Events have left us no choice. The people have learned their duty, and have instructed us accordingly. Let us do our part, and, as their heralds, proclaim universal freedom. Having thus declared a policy, plain, but imperishable, our armies, while winning a glorious and enduring peace, will secure by the same crowning victories the enfranchisement of the human race, and so brighten the future with blessings for the oppressed and enslaved of all the earth, that posterity, amazed at the magnitude of their achievements, will record that as they marched,

"High in front advanced,
The brandished sword of God before them blazed Fierce as a comet."

"The brandished sword of God?" ay, "the brandished sword of God!" He has led this holy crusade for country and for freedom. When men despaired because they could discover no solution of the dreadful enigma which slavery propounded; when even the churches quailed before it and prostituted the Bible to the propitiation of the monster, God came to the rescue, and solved the riddle by destroying the sphinx. If God is nowhere else recognized in the Constitution, nevertheless He will speak in every word of this amendment. His providence has nursed it into being. Out of the hard discipline of civil war He has evoked and made intelligible to all men a thought divine, which will ever serve as a guiding inspiration for the nation in its toilsome search to discover by the lights of experience the true philosophy of free government. Therefore, when peace shall again reign with unbroken sway from ocean to ocean and from the lakes to the gulf, and freedom, no longer vexed by the sight of a slave, shall sanctify to perfect fruition the inestimable fruits of labor, then, mindful of their great deliverance, let all the people, as they emerge from the stormy waters and tread again the dry land, join in the song of him who aforetime led his brethren out of bondage:

"Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?"

"Thou in Thy mercy hast led forth the people which Thou hast redeemed; Thou hast guided them in Thy strength unto Thy holy habitation."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to detain the House but ten minutes. If I had a speech to make I should have too much prudence to deliver it until the eloquence of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] had ceased ringing in our ears. But I wish to say a few words upon the President's message. It is brief, (a great virtue in public documents,) it treats of subjects of deep importance, not only to this nation but to the whole family of man. I do not think I am extravagant when I say that it is the most important and best message that has been communicated to Congress for the last sixty years. The style of an executive document is not always expected to be of the highest order, but is often criticised by a carping Opposition. Although the President has never made much pretension to a polished education, yet I nowhere see the least fault found with the composition of his late message. So deeply was he impressed with the greatness of his subject, so free from that vain-glorious and selfish ambition that leads to an inflated and vicious taste, that he expressed his ideas in the purest and simplest English, which, in my judgment, is hardly surpassed by the happiest efforts of Addison. This, however, is of but little importance compared with its principles.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] condemns two positions taken by the President. I shall not attempt to answer his elaborate speech, so full of literary and historic allusions, which in superficial scholars might look like pedantry, but in the learned gentleman are but the natural and graceful overflow of a well-stored mind.

The two topics which he condemns are, first, that the war must go on without seeking negotiation; and second, that the war must continue until slavery is abolished throughout the United States.

I think the gentleman will find but few loyal men who will agree with him that this Government should sue for peace. For it must be remembered that very few of those who voted for General McClellan were peace men. A few very respectable members of the Democratic party were desirous that the North should submit rather than continue this civil strife. Mr. Vallandigham was among the most prominent of that class. Whatever may be said of him now, I have always looked upon him as among the most able, sincere, and gentlemanly of his party; yet when he lately ran for office in his own State the people almost unanimously deserted him. What could have left my excellent and able colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means so far behind the distance-pole at the late election? Their personal accomplishments and high characters deserved a better fate. But so hateful (to the people) was the cowardly suggestion that we should lay down our arms to armed rebels, that even their virtues did not save them from the overwhelming condemnation of the people. And yet when the intelligent electors of the nation so gloriously and bravely determined that there should be no compromise with armed traitors, the gentleman from New York condemns the President because he did not disregard that instruction and seek reconciliation with parricides and rebels.

Sir, I give the President all honor for his course on this question. Never had a man to decide so important a question under such difficulties. He was obliged to decide it for himself, not only unaided, but in the midst of the most distracting counsels. I am disclosing no secret when I state that his Cabinet has never been a unit. He could receive no aid from them; and I am mortified to be obliged to say that elsewhere, where he had a right to expect wise suggestions, he found nothing but timidity, hesitancy, and moral cowardice. From the moment the great victory was known, while salvos of cannon were proclaiming to the world the virtue and firmness of the people, the controlling journals of the party, and able gentlemen whose standing seemed to justify them in tendering their advice, joined in urging the President to pursue the very course which the gentleman from New York now condemns him for not doing.

It is easy to see what perplexities surrounded him. The peace party of copperheads, and the Chicago convention before the election, and his own leading friends after the election, all beseeched him to humble the nation before defiant traitors and ask a compromise. He took counsel of his own wiser judgment, stood firmly erect, and saved the nation from disgrace. There never was a day since Abraham Lincoln was elected President that he stood so high, or deserved to stand so high in the estimation of the people as at this moment. For purity of heart and firmness of character he would compare well with the best of the conscript fathers. But the chief anxiety of the gentleman is to save from destruction the darling institution of the Democratic party, the institution of human bondage. The gentleman condemns the President's determination to insist on the abandonment of slavery.

In this every man of real humanity and justice throughout the whole world will differ with the gentleman, and posterity will record their abhorrence of his doctrines in impartial history.

There was a time in our history when the gentleman might excuse himself for protecting slavery by the provisions of the Constitution. But as war, declared by the rebel belligerent, has abrogated that obligation, and broken the ligament that tied us to that infamous institution, he can have no excuse, no palliation for his defense of it but his innate love of its horrid principles. And yet the gentleman has exhausted the stores of ancient and modern history, sacred and profane, in its defense.

He declares its extinction impossible, and says that no nation ever attempted to produce homogeneity among its inhabitants. He tells us that neither Rome nor Greece, neither the Achaean league, nor any other confederate nation, found homogeneity possible, and hence it is not possible here.

If the gentleman means by homogeneity that all the people must be of one race, then he is right. Confederations are supposed to be of different tribes and languages. But Rome did not hesitate to incorporate conquered nations among her own citizens. She seized the Sabine women for their wives. When she conquered Alba she not only transported the inhabitants to Rome, but colonized the conquered country. But the question of homogeneity has nothing to do with the abolition of slavery. If the gentleman had shown that confederations could have no uniform laws operating over all their members, he would have argued to the point. This is a question of the uniformity of national laws operating over the whole republic. If our national organic law be so improved as to exclude slavery from the nation, what is there to prevent its uniformity throughout the Republic? When the assembly of the Achaean league passed a law, it bound every member of the confederation. When the Amphictyonic council decreed, it pervaded every State within its jurisdiction. When the Swiss council pass laws, they operate equally through every canton. In all of these cases the municipal laws of each member of the confederacy remained, except where they were in conflict with the national law. In our Republic we have laws acting uniformly over every State. Where they are in conflict with the local municipal laws, the latter must give way. In all things else the States are supreme. Our revenue laws are uniform—the same in South Carolina as in Massachusetts; and any adverse municipal law of the State would be void.

Our laws regulating the Army and Navy are uniform. Our national bankrupt laws reach over the whole Union, and annihilate any opposing State bankrupt law. The Constitution itself provides for its own amendment. There is no subject with reference to which it cannot be amended. If, then, the amendment recommended by the President, and supported by the Republican party, abolishing and forever prohibiting slavery within the Republic should prevail, what is there to prevent its operating uniformly over every State? The local laws, where not controlled by the paramount Constitution, would still exist. It will take sharp eyes to see anything in the historical cases cited by the gentleman that militates against the possibility or feasibility of such a homogeneity, if the gentleman calls it by that name. Uniformity in the laws relative to slavery is all that is asked; that is rendered impossible only by the sturdy defense which the gentleman and his associates make for the most inhuman and now the most despised of human villainies. The gentleman wishes the war to cease; so do we all. There is one way by which the gentleman and his friends can end it.

Those who believe that a righteous Providence punishes nations for national sins believe that this terrible plague is brought upon us as a punishment for our oppression of a harmless race of men inflicted without cause and without excuse for ages. I accept this belief; for I remember that an ancient despot, not so cruel as this Republic, held a people in bondage—a bondage much lighter than American slavery; that the Lord ordered him to liberate them. He refused. His whole people were punished. Plague after plague was sent upon the land until the seventh slew the first-born of every household; nor did they cease until the tyrant "let the people go." We have suffered more than all the plagues of Egypt; more than the first-born of every household has been taken. We still harden our hearts and refuse to let the people go. The scourge still continues, nor do I expect it to cease until we obey the high behest of the Father of men. We are about to have another opportunity to obey this command. We are about to ascertain the national will by another vote to amend the Constitution. If gentlemen opposite will yield to the voice of God and humanity and vote for it, I verily believe the sword of the destroying angel will be stayed and this people be reunited. If we still harden our hearts and blood must still flow, may the ghosts of the slaughtered victims sit heavily upon the souls of those who cause it. If it were given to man to look back from a future world and know what posterity will say of them, I fear the gentleman from New York, when he has gone hence and left nothing but his fame behind, would blush at the record which impartial history will make on this subject.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this debate has been confined hitherto to the other side. I dislike to interrupt its fraternal tone; nor shall I call attention to questions that are foregone, discussed, and disposed of in the late election. But after the remarks of gentlemen something should be heard from this side of the Chamber.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] follows the example of the President in his message; he makes an earnest appeal to us of this side to vote for the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. He has made that appeal in a well-digested speech and with more than usual solemnity—in the name of God and humanity. He has also referred to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks], who will no doubt give him a fitting answer. It is only my purpose now to return the interest taken by gentlemen in our opinions and future action, and to make an appeal to my friend from Pennsylvania and to the gentlemen with whom he is so paternal. I make this appeal with all the earnestness of my nature; not in the name of the avenging God whom he invokes, but in the name of the God of mercy, that if it be possible, the further effusion of blood in this most unhappy country shall be stayed.

The gentleman will tell me, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] has said, that there is no opportunity of producing such a result without making a peace that would be dishonorable; that we have no sign from the rebel authorities at Richmond indicating anything except that they will adhere to their ideas of national independence.

Without expressing my own opinion on that point, I ask gentlemen to consider carefully what they ask of us. Do you not wish our aid in carrying a proposition to change the Constitution and the form and structure of our federative system in its most essential feature? Do you not wish us to annul the municipal control of each State over domestic matters? Is your proposition simply to abolish slavery? Or is it a measure to invest the Federal Government with authority to enslave the local white citizen, hold him in vassalage to a central power, and assume the right to dictate to the States what their home policy shall be on home affairs? In fine, is it not an abstract scheme to enfranchise the black, who is really being freed by war, by a total change in the very genius, soul, and body of our Government?

When you make a request so momentous, may I not respectfully demand that you should first try, in real, genuine, honest, bona fide earnestness, to reach the men in the South who are refractory, insurgent, and belligerent; that you should endeavor to bring them back, if you can, to their old fealty to an unchanged charter and to an unmutated Union? Ah! do gentlemen tell me that such a suggestion is disloyal and traitorous? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania characterize it by the ordinary political language which, in the heat of party strife and passion, is applied to the Democratic party?

He refers to a distinguished journal on the other side. I refer him now to a journal of the Republican persuasion, edited by a gentleman now upon this floor, (Mr. Horace Greeley.)

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will allow me to say that when I referred to distinguished journals they were journals of the Republican and not of the opposite party.

Mr. COX. I was about to refer to a journal of that character to answer the gentleman. When he stigmatized gentlemen upon this side with epithets which in decorous debate I will not repeat, I ask him to read the New York Tribune of yesterday morning. It is edited by a gentleman who I now see in this Chamber conferring with members on that side in reference to a project of peace. [Laughter.] Will he peruse that article and then reproach the leading editor of his own party for holding precisely the same opinions entertained by members upon this side?

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. COX. In one moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman. I wish merely to say that I know the opinions of the gentleman to whom reference is made. He is distinguished, patriotic, able. He does not want me to refrain from saying what I think, and I do not want him not to say what he thinks. I never agreed with him in reference to proposing peace.

Mr. COX. I know that the gentleman does not agree with the "distinguished, patriotic, able" editor of the New York Tribune; but that same distinguished, patriotic, able editor was voted for by his party for elector for the State of New York at large. He will soon cast his vote for the President whom the gentleman has just now so highly eulogized. And now I tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is hardly consistent or just for him to speak as he does of my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] and the party which upheld him; to characterize members upon this side of the House as "copperheads" and "traitors" because they have been peacefully inclined at proper times, on proper occasions, and for patriotic purposes, when they only hold to the identical doctrine contained in the New York Tribune, whose editor is so able and patriotic! But let the article speak for itself. I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read for the information and instruction of gentlemen on that side.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Our special Washington dispatch gives, we have no doubt, along with many bits of idle gossip, the true explanation of Mr. F. P. Blair's abortive mission toward Richmond. The gist of the matter is, that Mr. Blair, believing that he might, by visiting Richmond, pave the way to a just and lasting pacification of the country, proposed to go there, and the President, while he declined to give the visit an official character, saw no reason for preventing it.

Mr. Blair, accompanied by his son Montgomery, accordingly repaired to General Grant's headquarters before Richmond, but was not allowed to proceed further because the Secretary of War, believing no good could be effected by his proposed conference with the confederate chiefs, saw fit to intimate to General Grant that he did not approve Mr. Blair's proceeding, nor believe that it could result in any good; which General Grant very naturally interpreted as a hint from his immediate superior not to allow Mr. Blair to pass his lines on his way to Richmond. Mr. Blair has thereupon returned, per force, to Washington.

"Assuming this to be substantially the truth of the matter, we cannot doubt that a majority of the American people will regret Mr. Stanton's decision. We do not know, and have at no time felt confident, that the rebels are yet prepared to agree to any terms of pacification that our Government either would or should deem acceptable; but we can imagine no possible harm that could result from ascertaining precisely what they are ready to do. The recognized object of war, at least among civilized and Christian nations, is an honorable and satisfactory peace; and how are we to know when this end has been rendered attainable unless we take some means to ascertain? An established, rightfully constituted Government, combating an armed and menacing rebellion, should strain every nerve to overcome at the earliest moment the resistance it encounters, and should not merely welcome but seek satisfactory (however informal) assurances that its end has been attained. It cannot afford to give countenance to even a groundless imputation that it contemplates with satisfaction a continuance of hostilities for their own sake, on any ground of mere punctilio, or for any other reason than because it is compelled, by an absorbing regard for the very ends of its existence. In our judgment, therefore, assuming that we have a correct apprehension of the leading facts, Mr. Stanton has made a grave mistake, one that the country will not be inclined permanently to acquiesce in."

Mr. COX. Now my friend from Pennsylvania characterizes the author of that publication as a distinguished and able patriot. He does not even now, after hearing the editorial read, withdraw that expression from Mr. Greeley. Yet for holding and propagating the same opinions held by the delegates who met at Chicago and nominated General McClellan; held by my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] who was on the ticket with him, enunciated in the letter of acceptance of General McClellan when he spoke of "exhausting all the resources of statesmanship practiced by civilized nations and taught by the traditions of the American people consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure peace and reestablish the Union;" enunciated in that letter with even more emphasis and distinctness than in the platform adopted at Chicago, and whose transcript in letter and spirit is to be found in the very language of the editor of the New York Tribune; for entertaining and stating these Christian and statesmanlike sentiments, the gentleman from Pennsylvania regards a Republican as a distinguished patriot but a Democrat as a traitorous "copperhead."

Why does not the gentleman, who is always bold and defiant in his expression, denounce that editor who is now conferring with his brother Republicans about peace? Why does he not have the rules of the House read and drive him as an interloper from this Chamber? [Laughter.] Why does he confer with Mr. Blair, the supposititious ambassador, who, even now as I speak, is also present in the Chamber? Why are ye all in conference here, so suspiciously near and fraternal, if it is not to carry out the very ideas promulgated at Chicago, and for which one million seven hundred and fifty thousand people in this country gave their patriotic votes? What answer can the gentleman from Pennsylvania make? None, unless he heaps reproaches upon his own party and the very able, distinguished, and patriotic elector, who will cast his vote for Mr. Lincoln, or unless he withdraws the unhandsome language used by him toward the Democratic party and its nominees.

Mr. Chairman, I am not insensible to the appeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I answer his appeal in the name of God and humanity to vote for the abolition amendment by beseeching him, in the first place, before he asks us to disturb our political system and the established order, and to change the old ideas and forms connected with municipal liberty, and the legislation of domestic matters by State sovereignty; before he asks us to change the organic law of this land for seventy years, I beseech him that he will, at least, try to ascertain, formally or informally, whether there is any hope of these insurgent States, yet in most formidable, consuming, and flagrant war, returning to the "established and rightfully constituted Government." I beseech this in the name of civilization and Christianity—

God and humanity! I pray for it on behalf of nearly two million white men who have voted these enlightened sentiments.

Do you tell me that you will only hear from Mr. Davis that he will only stand on the independence of his republic? Very well, let us hear that. It will be unwelcome; but let us know it. There is a million of people who believe that Davis and the men associated with him would treat upon the basis of the old Union, or at least that however negotiations might begin, they would thus terminate. I do not say that I believe it. I do not say that members upon this side believe it; but I say, in the language of this able, distinguished, and patriotic editor, let us at least "take some means to ascertain" that fact. Let us discard punctilio and reach the fact. No harm can come from its ascertainment. If the confederate president refuses to confer upon the basis of the unamended Constitution and old Union; if he will not help to reestablish peace upon the old order, or at least as near to it as the passion and strife of men have made it possible and practicable, will not our knowledge of that fact inspire a more healthful and united sentiment among the people, even if it do not influence our votes upon the amendment as to slavery? Therefore, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it would not have been best before he makes these pathetic appeals in the name of the Father of men and the God of humanity to have made an attempt by Christian and rational methods to stanch the bleeding wounds of the body-politic, to save the shedding of blood, to stop the increase of taxation, the accumulation of debt, the destruction of values, and the everlasting iteration of penal laws on our Federal statute, to stay, if possible, the maiming and killing of men, and the tears of widows and orphans, the desolation by fire and sword of our land, and to save, oh! yes, before it is too late forever, to save the Union while it may be worth the sacrifices made for its salvation. Will he not give up something on his part? Give up his doctrine of negro equality? Give up his idea of breaking down State institutions by Federal law?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will allow me to say that I never held to that doctrine of negro equality.

Mr. COX. Then I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to hold that all men are created equal?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir, but not equality in all things—simply before the laws, nothing else.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to give up his idea of the equality of the black and white races before the law.

Mr. STEVENS. I won't do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. When you make such touching appeals as you have just made to us, may I not ask you in return, in the name of the white race of America, to yield something on your part and in their behalf?

Mr. Chairman, I did intend this morning, had the opportunity offered, to present some resolutions. I have them here, drawn up in the language of the "patriotic, able, and distinguished" editor of the New York Tribune. I shall offer them at a convenient opportunity. I would not deprive gentlemen upon the other side of a chance to show their civilization, their Christianity, their hatred of rapine, desolation, and bloodshed, their love for the Union and the Constitution, by voting for at least some effort, as Mr. Greeley recommends, to ascertain the disposition of the insurgent States.

I am not clear as to the best mode to ascertain this disposition. Perhaps it would be best to send the honorable Mr. Blair and his venerable father to Richmond. Perhaps it would be best to send the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no; I do not think I would get back. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I do not know. The gentleman has such a persuasive way. He can appeal with such pathos to God and humanity; he would make such kindly and pious appeals to those in rebellion against God and humanity, that he might induce them at least to consider a proposition for peace, founded upon their old allegiance.

Mr. Greeley is not specific as to the best way of ascertaining what we desire; judge ye, therefore, whether it is best to send commissioners or agents, or receive from them commissioners here; whether by ascertaining if they will meet us in national convention and abide by its judgment in all points in dispute, or whether we should, to use the language of General McClellan, echoed now by Mr. Greeley, exhaust all the arts of Christian and civilized statesmanship and the traditions of our nation to bring these recusants back to their old Constitution. Civilization as practiced by the most refined nations regards every effort at peace as humane and honorable; and Christianity would regard, even toward the heathen, and certainly toward our brethren, all such efforts as inspired by the very genius of humanity, moderation, and mercy. In this spirit let us make some effort. Try it. No harm can come from trying; and if it fail, we on this side of the Chamber will be better ready to consider your proposition to change the organic law.

Mr. Chairman, I would like before I conclude to have read from the Clerk's desk the resolutions which I shall hereafter propose to the House. They are almost in the language of the editorial in the Tribune, modified to suit the circumstances under which they are offered. The civilized or Christian portion of the Republican party shall have a chance of putting themselves on the record before they ask formally for a vote on the constitutional amendment. I ask to have the resolutions read.

The resolutions were read by the Clerk, as follows:

Whereas the country hails with manifestations of patriotic joy and congratulation the victories recently achieved by our brave armies; and whereas "the recognized object of war, at least among civilized and Christian nations, is an honorable and satisfactory peace; and that although we do not know that the insurgents are yet prepared to agree to any terms of pacification that our Government either would or should deem acceptable, yet as there can be no possible harm resulting from ascertaining precisely what they are ready to do; and in order to refute the imputation that the Administration contemplates with satisfaction a continuance of hostilities for their own sake, on any ground of mere punctilio, or for any reason than because it is compelled, by an absorbing regard for the very ends of its existence; and whereas "an established and rightly constituted Government, combating armed and menacing rebellion, should strain every nerve to overcome at the earliest moment the resistance it encounters, and should not merely welcome, but seek, satisfactory (however informal) assurances that its ends has been attained;" Therefore,

Resolved, That now, in this hour of victory, which is the hour of magnanimity, and before any action be taken to change the Constitution of the United States, it is eminently the duty of the President, on the basis of the present "rightfully constituted Government," either to send or receive commissioners or agents, with a view to national pacification and tranquillity, or by some other rational means known to civilized and Christian nations, secure the cessation of hostilities and the union of the States.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman from Vermont be kind enough to withdraw that motion for a few moments?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. PRUYN. I have only a very few words to say, and I am sorry that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is not present to hear them.

Mr. STEVENS. I am here.

Mr. PRUYN. I beg your pardon, sir. I am very glad that you are here.

I have only to call attention to the very great change that has taken place in the sentiments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the subject of the rebellion and of the status of the people of the southern States. We on this side of the Chamber—I, at least, speaking for myself, and I believe for the body of my friends—claim that the Union has never been dissolved, but that it exists in its integrity till this day; that the people of the South are rebels against the laws and the Constitution; and that the whole object of the present struggle is to put down that rebellion and bring the rebels back to obedience.

In the very memorable speech which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made to this House at the last session, perhaps the most memorable of the session, and which was listened to with the greatest interest on both sides of the House, he told us, in substance, that by the proclamation of blockade in 1861 we had acknowledged the South as belligerents; that they were a foreign Power; that the war was a war between nationalities, and was not a war to put down the rebellion, and, consequently, that the rebels had all the rights of belligerents, were entitled to be treated as such, and had been treated as such by all the Powers of Europe; and that we, in consequence of the act of our own Government, were bound to treat them in the same way. But now I understand that gentleman to have entirely reversed his position, and to claim that the people of the South are simply rebels against our laws, and that the war is carried on to put down the rebellion. In that he does not occupy the position which he occupied during the last session.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, how did I make myself so misunderstood? From what does the gentleman infer that I have changed my opinion?

Mr. PRUYN. I will quote the language which the gentleman used last year.

Mr. STEVENS. I remember very well what I said last year; but wherein have I changed? I have only said that the South having for a time maintained their independent government and raised armies, and we having blockaded their ports and Europe having deemed them belligerents, they were by the laws of nations belligerents. I tried to prove that, and thought I had done so. I tried to prove that they stood in relation to us, in their belligerent character, the same as any foreign nation. I hold the same now, and I do not know to what the gentleman refers when he supposes that I have changed that opinion. I hold still just what I held then. And I hold further that they shall never, by my vote, come back into the Union unless as new States organized from conquered territory.

Mr. PRUYN. I am quite right, Mr. Chairman, in the view that I took, and I will quote only one or two paragraphs from the gentleman's speech of last year, to show that if I understood correctly what he said this morning—and I think the committee agrees with me in that understanding—his position now is utterly inconsistent with the ground he assumed last year. Speaking of the rebel States, the gentleman says:

"No one acquainted with the magnitude of this contest can deny to it the character of a civil war. For nearly three years the confederate States have maintained their declaration of independence by force of arms. True, they have met with sad defeats. But success has not been all on one side. But what renders their position beyond controversy is, the great Powers of Europe have acknowledged them as belligerents, entitled from foreign nations to equal rights with the parent Government. What is still more conclusive, we have acknowledged them as belligerents ourselves. With unfortunate haste we blockaded their ports. A blockade is declared only against a foreign nation. If they were still members of the Union we should repeal the laws establishing ports of entry. A nation does not blockade itself. We have treated their captive soldiers as prisoners of war, not as rebels; we have exchanged prisoners; we have sent and received flags of truce. This is not the usage awarded to an unorganized banditti."

Now the gentleman comes here this morning and claims that they are not a foreign nation.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir, I made use of no such expression, and nothing which can be tortured into it.

Mr. PRUYN. Very well; then the gentleman's position is not quite so favorable as I supposed it to be. What does he claim? For what were his citations from Scripture brought before this House, except to show that we were to execute vengeance upon these people? He spoke of them this morning as rebels, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS. I cited Scripture to show that the Lord punished us for not abolishing slavery; and that He would continue to punish us until we did abolish it; not that He was punishing the South.

Mr. PRUYN. Not in one view of the case, I grant. But I certainly understood the gentleman to say, as well as I could understand him at the distance I sat from him, that it was our duty, our moral duty, our religious duty, to go and put down this rebellion as a rebellion, and not as a contest with a foreign Power. If I misunderstood him I beg his pardon. But I certainly think the House will concur with me in that view of the matter, and that the report of the debate will bear out that view.

Now, in reference to this point, which is one of the most important which was ever discussed in this House, and which brought the administration of this Government before foreign nations in the light of having virtually, through its prominent public men, admitted the South to be belligerents. Now, if such be the construction given by this Government to our position toward the South, what right have we to complain of the conduct of the Powers of Europe in acknowledging the South as belligerents?

Shortly after this discussion took place, I referred to it in a conversation with a distinguished officer of the Army, one who stands high in the estimation of the Republican party, not only as a military but as a political leader. He said he perfectly understood the position of Mr. STEVENS, and that he had thought much of the views he had expressed. I said to him, "What right have we to find fault with the conduct of England in reference to the acknowledgment of the belligerent rights of the South?" And his prompt reply was, "None, whatever." Now we are to look upon these belligerents as one thing or the other.

Mr. STEVENS. I will ask the gentleman whether, after a people have maintained three years of civil war, have formed a government, have raised armies and maintained their existence for three years, does the gentleman blame England, France, or anybody else, for acknowledging them as belligerents—not acknowledging their independence? Does the gentleman so understand the law of nations?

Mr. PRUYN. I did not. I was only stating the position assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and others who hold with him.

Mr. STEVENS. I never assumed that position.

Mr. PRUYN. I claim that we are putting down a rebellion, not fighting a foreign nation, not fighting another nation. We commenced the attempt to enforce our Constitution and our laws. In that we are engaged. Every nation enforces its laws as it pleases. If there is a street brawl, you send out the police force of the city to put it down. If the sheriff is resisted in the serving of his process, you call out a competent posse comitatus to aid him. If it assumes larger proportions you call out the military. Yet the gentleman thinks that because we instituted the blockade to assist in the enforcement of our laws, we thereby acknowledge the South to be belligerents. I deny the inference; for in that proclamation of blockade, as I have before stated to the House, the occasion of it is distinctly set forth; the world is told that it is one of the means employed to put down the rebellion; and it closes with this significant declaration, which no publicist in the world can misconstrue: that when any person claiming any right on the high seas under this pretended confederation of States shall molest the commerce of the United States, that person shall be deemed guilty of piracy. Is that the language which one belligerent holds with regard to another? No, never; and I insist upon it that the President, by his proclamation of blockade, issued in 1861, never meant to acknowledge the South as belligerents, and by no fair construction of that instrument can they be made such.

Now, sir, the remarks made this morning by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CRESWELL,] in advance of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and I had supposed those of the latter gentleman to partake somewhat of the same character, but he denies it, and I am bound to believe his statement—treated this controversy as one in which we were to inflict upon the South not only subjugation, but, as it were, vengeance. Now, sir, I utterly detest any such doctrine. Vengeance is not for us. The Almighty, in His wisdom, may inflict upon man such penalties and judgments as He pleases. We are bound down to certain rules of humanity and religion; for He has said to us, in words which cannot be mistaken, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay."

Mr. GRINNELL moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DONNELLY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the President's annual message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, of New York, the House (at twenty-five minutes after three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 6, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 20th of December, 1864, information in relation to the disposition of the land of the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi, under the treaty of October 1, 1859; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in pursuance of the proviso to the first section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1869, a statement exhibiting the various amounts transferred from and to appropriations during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition of non-commissioned officers and privates of the second Connecticut light battery, stationed at the mouth of White river, Arkansas, praying that the Army ration of 1863 may be restored, the present quantity of bread, flour, potatoes, and rice allowed being deficient; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of officers of the Army, in the service of the United States with the army of the James, praying an increase of the pay of Army officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CLARK presented a petition of officers of New Hampshire regiments now in the field, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of Brevet Brigadier General T. M. Harris and other officers of the Army, in the service of the United States on the James, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented fourteen petitions of officers in the military service of the United States, praying an increase of pay of Army officers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Charles Colburn, praying payment of a balance claimed to be due him for service in the United States Navy as yeoman of the receiving ship Ohio, from which it is alleged he was unlawfully discharged by the abolishment of the office by the President of the United States on the 31st of January, 1847, without authority of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARLAN presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, transmitting a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in relation to the grade and compensation of clerks in that bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition of citizens of Worcester, Massachusetts, calling on Congress to enact a law to secure a republican form of government and abolish and forever prohibit slavery in the United States. This is signed by Ichabod Washburn, a gentleman connected with business and affairs on a very large scale, one of the largest contributors to the internal revenue of the country that we have in New England. I move that the petition be referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of R. Reynolds and Charles Young, praying that the Commissioner of Patents may be authorized to issue a patent to them for an improved hay elevator, the application having lapsed, as is alleged, through an error by which the second patent fee was misapplied; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Blake Brothers & Co., praying for the allowance of interest on certain certificates of indebtedness, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of surgeons and assistant surgeons in the Army, praying for an increase of rank and pay, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 366) to remit certain duties on clothing materials imported for the use of the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. Wilson, that there be printed of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1864 twelve hundred extra copies for the use of the Senate, and three thousand copies for distribution from the office of the Coast Survey, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was agreed to.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate how many agents for paying pensions there are in the employment of the Government; how many in each State; what their pay is; how they are appointed, and under what law, and whether there are any limits as to number.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 367) to repeal the provision of law requiring certain regents of the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians residing in Michigan, the sum of $192,850, was recommended to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PACIFIC DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to send to the Senate copies of all letters received from the commander of the Pacific department relating to a recent attempt to send arms and munitions of war out of that department to Mexico.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 375) levying internal duties on tobacco; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the Senator whether he proposes to have the bill printed. It relates to a subject which interests the community very much.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do. I will state further that the bill was not prepared by me, but by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I desire to have it printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred, and the order to print will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PROCEEDINGS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 88) regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is in line five of section two, to strike out the word "ten" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

On a trial for any other offense the defendant shall be entitled to five and the United States to two peremptory challenges.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary what is the effect of this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The effect of the amendment of the committee which is now pending, is to reduce the number of challenges on the part of the Government allowed by the bill as it was originally introduced, from ten to five, I think.

There is some diversity of opinion in the different circuits, as the committee were informed, as to the practice in this respect; and it was thought better to have it uniform. The bill was reported at the last session. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has particular charge of it, and he can inform the Senator from Indiana in regard to it, if he desires any information as to the particular effect of each of the amendments.

I see that the Secretary is under a misapprehension; the amendment reported is by way of substitute for the whole bill. It strikes out the whole of it and inserts a substitute, and one of the provisions of the substitute makes this change from what the bill was as it was originally introduced. If the Senator from Indiana will send for a copy of the bill No. 88, he will find that the amendment reported by the committee is a substitute for the original bill. I ask that the substitute be read to the Senate; it will then be better understood.

Mr. JOHNSON. The chairman is right. The bill as it was originally introduced consisted of eighteen sections. The Committee on the Judiciary reported that the whole of that bill should be stricken out, and as a substitute for it that there should be inserted all that follows it in the printed copy from the 6th page onward, printed in italics, beginning with the words "that from the persons summoned," &c.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the subject-matter now before the body, and the question is on amending that amendment. The Senator from Illinois asks that the amendment be again read. It will be if there be no objection. Does the Chair understand the Senator as asking that the entire amendment be read?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is but one amendment, which is a substitute for the whole bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment to that amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not appear so on the printed copy before me.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was an amendment offered in the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware of that. Then I ask that the amendment to the amendment be again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section two of the amendment of the committee in line five, by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "five;" so that the clause will read:

On a trial for any other offense the defendant shall be entitled to five and the United States to two peremptory challenges.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask if that is an amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, it is not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is an amendment of which I was not aware. I do not think the committee reported it, and I shall vote against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The papers show that the amendment was offered by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN Eyck.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot see the propriety of that amendment. I think the original number proposed by the committee is right enough.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. JOHNSON. As well as I recollect, and the Secretary confirms my recollection in that particular, I suggested an amendment to the bill as it came from the committee when it was considered at the last session. It has not been printed, and perhaps the Senate are not aware that the printed bill does not exactly show the bill upon which they are about to act. I ask that the words which were inserted on my motion, by general consent be now read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment was in line four of the reported amendment, after the word "offense" to insert "in which the right of peremptory challenge now exists;" so as to read:

On a trial for any other offense in which the right of peremptory challenge now exists, the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges.

The amendment was concurred in, and is to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That from the persons summoned and accepted as grand jurors in any district or circuit court of the United States the court shall appoint the foreman, who shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses appearing before the grand jury.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when the offense charged be treason or a capital offense, the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges. On a trial for any other offense in which the right of peremptory challenge now exists, the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges. All challenges, whether to the array or panel or to individual jurors for cause or favor, shall be tried by the court without the aid of triers.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in every case where any person convicted of any offense against the United States shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period longer than one year, it shall be lawful for the court by which the sentence is passed to order the same to be executed in any State prison or penitentiary within the district or State where such court is held, the use of which prison or penitentiary is allowed by the Legislature of such State for such purposes; and the expenses attendant upon the execution of such sentence shall be paid by the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court of the United States may be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorneys of record, file a stipulation in writing with the clerk of the court waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which finding may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury. The rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, when excepted to at the time, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, or upon appeal, provided the rulings be duly presented by a bill of exceptions. When the finding is special, the review may also extend to the determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of June, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, (subsequently.) I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill upon which the Senate have just acted, for the purpose of making an amendment to correct what would be an obvious absurdity in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 83 was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be regarded as before the Senate on its third reading, without any further motion to reconsider, if there be no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now move to strike out the word "four," in the sixth section, and to insert the word "five." As it stands now the bill is to go into operation on the 1st day of June, 1861, which is past.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

UNEMPLOYED GENERALS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 586, to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

As it appears that many general officers in the regular and volunteer forces of the Army of the United States are, and have been for some time past, either entirely unemployed or not on duty corresponding to their rank, thus holding commissions and drawing pay and allowances without any equivalent services rendered to the Government, and at the same time standing in the way of the promotion and consequent increase of compensation of the officers of inferior grade who are performing the duties proper to such general officers, the bill therefore provides that all major generals and all brigadier generals in the military service of the United States who on the 1st of February, 1865, shall not be in the performance of duty or service corresponding to their respective grades and rank, and who shall not have been engaged in such duty or service for three months continuously next prior to that date, shall then be dropped from the rolls of the Army, and all the pay and emoluments, or allowances, of such general officers, so dropped, shall cease from that date, and the vacancies thus occasioned may be filled by new promotions and appointments as in other cases. But no officer is to be considered as included in the foregoing provision whose absence from duty shall have been occasioned by wounds received, or disease contracted, in the line of his duty while in the military service of the United States, or by his being a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy or under parole; and any major general of volunteers, or brigadier general of volunteers, who may have been appointed from the regular Army under the authority given in section four of the act approved July 22, 1861, "to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property," and the acts amendatory thereto, who shall be so dropped from the rolls, shall not thereby be discharged from the service of the United States, but shall be remitted to his position and duty as an officer of the regular Army.

The second section provides that hereafter, continuously, until the termination of the existing war of rebellion, on the last day of each month after the 15th of February, 1865, the provisions of the foregoing section shall be made applicable to any general officer in the military service of the United States who shall not on that day have been engaged in the performance of duty or service corresponding to his proper rank for three months consecutively then next preceding.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs made a report adverse to the passage of the bill, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred House bill No. 586, being an act to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers, beg leave to report:

"That many general officers in the regular and volunteer forces of the Army of the United States have been and now are unemployed or not on duty corresponding with their rank, thus holding commissions and drawing pay and allowances without any equivalent services rendered to the Government; and, at the same time, these officers stand in the way of the promotion and consequent increase of compensation of the officers of inferior grade who are performing the duties proper to such general officers. This is burdensome to the Treasury, unjust to meritorious officers in the field, and should be speedily remedied. The right and power to create vacancies in the rolls of the Army, and to fill such vacancies by appointments and promotions, are vested in the President of the United States. No additional powers are asked for by the President, nor demanded by the needs of the service.

"The committee are unanimously of the opinion that economy, justice, and the efficiency and general interests of the military service alike demand that where general officers in the regular and volunteer forces of the United States are found to be unfit for commands, and who are consequently unemployed or employed on duty not corresponding to their rank, they should be mustered out of the service, and that the vacancies thus created should be filled by new promotions and appointments, in order that the officers of an inferior grade who are performing the duties proper to such general officers may be promoted to the rank and receive the pay, allowances, and emoluments of such general officers. But the committee are of opinion that no fixed, inflexible rule of discrimination, such as is embodied in the joint resolution of the House of Representatives, could be adopted and executed consistently with equal and exact justice toward individual officers and with the interests of the military service of the country. Justice and the public interests demand that the power to muster general officers out of the service of the United States should be exercised with much discrimination and care. The power of removal and the responsibility of action being now fully and completely vested in the President, the committee unanimously report against the passage of the bill of the House of Representatives."

Mr. WILSON. I now move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Committee on Military Affairs have arrived at the conclusion to which they have come in regard to this bill. I am not prepared to controvert the soundness of the positions which the committee have assumed, or to deny that the Executive has competent authority to dismiss generals from the public service, but it is an authority which the Executive, and any Executive, would probably be very slow to exercise. I believe it has been customary in the history of the Government for Congress to exercise such a power as this; and upon that point the Committee on Military Affairs can correct me if I am in error. I understand that after the war of the Revolution, and after the war of 1812, Congress, by legislation, provided for disposing of the officers who had been found necessary and had been placed in positions during a time of war. They did not leave it to the President; and if we adopt this precedent now, and determine that it shall be left entirely to the Executive, is Congress to surrender up its authority to reduce the Army and to discharge the officers when this war is over? I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether, at the close of our former wars, there has not always been legislation to get rid of supernumerary officers who would not be necessary in a time of peace? It will not be pretended, upon the principle laid down in this report, but that the President might have dismissed those officers without any action of Congress; and yet if it has been the practice to have such action, why depart from it now?

Mr. GRIMES. It has not been the practice.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was informed by a Senator sitting near me that in 1816 or 1817 such an act of Congress was passed. I have not looked into the precedents, and do not know that such is the fact.

Mr. GRIMES. During the last war we created several regiments of the line, regular regiments, some thirty or forty, as we have during the present war. At the expiration of the war it became necessary for us to reduce the Army, and that required legislation; but the volunteer officers went out at the end of the war as a matter of course. So again we reduced the Army in 1819, down to some eight regiments of infantry, four regiments of artillery, and none of cavalry. Since that time we have been gradually increasing it. But that legislation was in regard to regular officers in the regular line of the Army. This legislation applies to all officers, both of volunteers and regulars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like the Senator from Iowa to tell me the difference between the power of the President to dismiss an officer of the regular Army and an officer in the volunteer service.

Mr. GRIMES. That is not the issue.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If he cannot do it in reference to the regular Army, can he in reference to the volunteer service?

Mr. GRIMES. That is not the issue the Senator raises. He undertakes to draw a parallel between the case now before the Senate and the case that was before the country after the war of 1812, and says because we found it necessary in 1814 or 1815 to adopt legislation in order to get rid of regular officers, captains, majors, and colonels, hence it is right and proper that we should follow that precedent and now adopt some legislation in order to get rid of supernumerary generals. My point is that there is no analogy between that case and the one at bar. It is in the power of the President. There is no controversy about that. I acknowledge the power of the President. The power is vested in him by the Constitution and laws, and if he has improper generals it is his duty to dismiss them, and he is responsible to the country for the manner in which they perform their duties to the country, and not us.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, if I understand the report of the committee, it goes entirely upon the ground that the President has authority to relieve the country of this evil of idle officers receiving pay from the Government in this hour of its distress and performing no service to the Government. That is the whole point of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is placed upon that ground.

The Senator from Iowa admits "that the President of the United States has the same authority over the regular Army as over the volunteer force to dismiss an officer," and he says that nobody disputes it. Then will the Senator from Iowa tell the Senate and the country why the legislation of 1815 or 1816—I have not time to refer to the statutes—was necessary to get rid of regular Army officers, any more than legislation is necessary now to get rid of volunteer officers?

Mr. GRIMES. I will answer that question. The law of Congress, at that time, created either fifteen or twenty new regiments, and directed that they should be officered by appointments by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 9.

The President had no power to abrogate those regiments. That legislation of 1819, and the legislation earlier than that, immediately after the war of 1812, was to get rid of those regiments that had been created; and of course when the regiments were disposed of their officers went with them. That is not this case. Here the proposition is to step in and interfere with the prerogative of the President of the United States, and say that any officer who has been for any purpose on furlough or on leave of absence for three months must necessarily be disbanded and go out of the public service. There is no analogy between the legislation at an earlier period of our history and that which is now proposed.

Mr. FOSTER. We propose to increase our Army, instead of diminishing it, by calling for three hundred thousand more men.

Mr. GRIMES. As the Senator from Connecticut has well said, we are calling for more men; we are calling for three hundred thousand more, I believe; so that these general officers will be required for the public service doubtless. At any rate, is it not best to allow the War Department and the President of the United States to determine for themselves whether they are not necessary for public service, whether it will not be necessary to retain them that they may command this new three hundred thousand levy when it shall be raised? Shall we step in and undertake to say, because a man has been put on furlough for three months—for nobody can tell the reason why—that that very fact incapacitates him for further public service in command?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I fail to see, notwithstanding what the Senator from Iowa has said, the want of analogy between the cases. The Senator from Iowa says that the regular regiments during the last war with Great Britain were created by law. They were not created one particle more by law than the volunteers. The major generals and the brigadier generals now holding office, and doing nothing for the country excepting to draw their salaries, are the creatures of law, and as completely an enactment of law as were the forces called out during the war of 1812, whether called regular soldiers or volunteers.

What is the distinction between your regular soldiers and your volunteers? I wish for one that that distinction was broken down. I believe it has been an injury to the service of the country. Your volunteers are enlisted for three years. So are your regular soldiers enlisted for three years. What is the difference between them? They are both brought out in pursuance of law. Will the Senator from Iowa tell me that one of these organizations is a creature of law more than the other, and that the rule that the President has not competent authority to act in reference to one is any more absolute than in reference to the other? Why, sir, I regard it as a misfortune entirely that this distinction should have been kept up. I think that the analogy, if you will look into the legislation, will be found to be complete. At any rate I fail to see how it makes a distinction upon the basis on which the Senator from Iowa places it, that those were regular forces called out in pursuance of law. So they all are; and the volunteers are just as brave, just as patriotic, and just as able to save the country, in my judgment, as what are called regular Army soldiers. The distinction that has been kept up in the Army between them, in my judgment has only been prolific of difficulty, and I wish it did not exist.

I have very little hope of being able to pass this bill with the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs against it; but I think it a very valuable bill. I think it is one that is called for by the interests of the country. I think it becomes us in this time of financial difficulty, when we want to husband the resources of the country, to see to it that supernumerary officers are not employed by the Government simply to receive salaries and not perform service. The fact set forth in the preamble to this bill cannot be controverted. What does it recite?

Whereas it appears that many general officers in the regular—

It applies to the regular as well as the volunteer force—and volunteer forces of the Army of the United States are, and have been for some time past, either entirely unemployed, or not on duty corresponding to their rank, thus holding commissions and drawing pay and allowances without any equivalent services rendered to the Government, and at the same time standing in the way of the promotion and consequent increase of compensation of the officers of inferior grade who are performing the duties proper to such general officers: Now, therefore, &c.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa, who seems to take a special interest in keeping these persons in office, what is the objection to the bill? Certainly the Senator from Iowa is not in favor of keeping that class of persons in office designated and referred to in the preamble to this bill. What is the objection to the bill? An encroachment on the executive prerogative? Not at all. I venture to say that the Executive will feel relieved rather than that his prerogative will be encroached upon by the passage of this act.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the very point and purpose of the act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is to relieve him, as my friend from California says. This bill does not necessarily and arbitrarily put out of service every unemployed officer. The President can retain him. He can put him in command if he does not wish to have him discharged. It will only apply to that class of officers whom the Executive and the military authorities have no use for, and will afford the means of ridding the country of them, and enabling gallant and meritorious officers, who are performing service, to take the places to which they are entitled. I do not regard it, therefore, in the light of an encroachment upon executive authority, but rather as a bill in aid of the execution of his duties by the Executive, affording an easy way, without heart-burnings, without special discriminations on the part of the Executive, which would prove injurious to the interests of the country, to get rid of these unnecessary officers.

Not being aware that the bill would come up this morning, I have not had an opportunity to look into the former legislation on this subject, but I think that this bill, when it is examined, will be found not inconsistent with the former legislation of the country. It certainly is not inconsistent in the points alluded to by the Senator from Iowa.

I should prefer to have the bill go over rather than take a vote upon it to-day, that we might look into the history of the Government on this subject a little further; but as it is brought up now, and there is very little hope, I presume, with this unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs against it, of being able to pass the bill, I do not know that I shall ask for its postponement; but I desired, at least, to call the attention of the Senate to it as one of great importance to the public service not only in the saving of money, but in opening to the men who deserve them the places occupied by men who do not deserve them.

Mr. GRIMES. When the Senator from Illinois shall coolly read the remarks he has made here to-day he will be able to judge for himself with how much fairness and ingenuousness he has treated this subject and put arguments into my mouth that I have not used. I have not intimated that I was the advocate of the worthless character of generals that are sought to be described in the preamble of this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I said you were not.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator used language that carried the idea that I stood here as the advocate of those men; and he put the inquiry to me whether or not I was the advocate of them, in that kind of manner and with that tone that indicated to the Senate, and to others who heard him, that I was the particular advocate and friend of that class of men.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, I said expressly that I did not suppose the Senator from Iowa wanted to keep those persons in the Army.

Mr. GRIMES. I think, too, the Senator was kind enough in his remarks to undertake to raise with me an issue between volunteer and regular soldiers, as though I stood here as the advocate of the regulars in contradistinction to the volunteer soldiers in the United States Army.

Now, sir, what is the history of this matter? This bill was brought before the Senate by the Senator from Massachusetts. He moved to indefinitely postpone it. The Senator from Illinois rose to oppose that motion. He insisted that the bill ought to pass instead of being indefinitely postponed, and as an argument in that behalf he quoted the authority of Congress at previous sessions. In reply to that I intimated to him that he was mistaken as to what the history of Congress was on this subject. According to my recollection, I have not refreshed it for some years, but according to my recollection there have been four different revisions of the Army; once immediately after the revolutionary war, again in 1798, again in 1815, and again in 1819, when we reduced it to the minimum at which we have ever had an Army in this country. The Army then was composed of regulars. Congress had declared that so many regiments, of such and such arms of the public service, should exist. Of course, therefore, as I stated to the Senator, it required some legislation of Congress in order to get rid of those regiments. The President had no authority to disband those regiments. Congress, therefore, adopted a form of legislation in order to get rid of them, and they provided some means by which those who might be regarded as the better officers in the various regiments should be retained to command the regiments that remained after the other regiments had been disbanded.

I insist that there is no analogy whatever between the legislation that was had at either one of those periods and that which is sought to be had at this time. What is it that we propose now? We propose to declare by a solemn act of Congress that every major and brigadier general who has not been in active service during the period of ninety days, I believe, shall immediately upon the passage of this act lose his commission. One man may have been wounded; another, as in a case within my own knowledge, has been stricken by a paralysis caused by exposure in the field, and from which he is past recovery. This bill takes the commission out of that man's pocket and returns him to his family and his constituents a disgraced man.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is mistaken. The bill provides for just such cases. There is a clause in it which covers them.

Mr. GRIMES. Does not the bill go into effect absolutely?

Mr. FOSTER. Unless the President or somebody interferes with the operation of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill is, "but no officer is to be considered as included in the foregoing provision whose absence from duty shall have been occasioned by wounds received or disease contracted in the line of his duty," &c.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not allow the President to settle that question under the law as it now stands? Is it to be inferred that all the men who are not now actively employed, and have not been actively employed for the period designated in the bill, are not valuable public servants; that they have not done the best that they could according to their capacity in the respective commands that they have heretofore held? Are you going to allow every man who happens to have fallen under the pique of a commanding officer, and therefore has been relieved for a little while, to be stricken from the rolls? Does not the Senate know that some of our major generals or commanders of divisions and commanders of corps have their prejudices and prepossessions as well as other men, and that for some trivial cause many men in the different corps of the Army have been sent home from duty, and have remained off duty during the length of three months? Is the Senate willing that all that class of men shall at one fell swoop be stricken from your Army register? Is that fair? Why does not the Senator propose that these men shall be sent before a military board, and let that board pass upon their capacity? If they have been derelict in their duty in the past, let them be condemned. If they have been wounded or stricken with paralysis, or are afflicted in any way so that they would be incapacitated for commands in the future, let a military board, composed partly of medical officers, so decide; let these men be treated fairly; and not let us here, the Senate of the United States, without any sort of evidence before us, declare that every man who may have been relieved from and off duty for the space of three months in consequence, perhaps, of the prejudice of his superior officer against him, shall be stricken from the rolls, and shall no longer be used in the public service. It strikes me, Mr. President, that a more unfair bill could not come under the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, having sanctioned this report of the Committee on Military Affairs, I deem it proper to say a word in reference to the past legislation and present position of this question. At the last session of Congress a similar joint resolution passed the House of Representatives and failed to pass the Senate. Early in the present session this bill was passed, and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, mustering out, by an act of Congress, arbitrarily, every officer who had not been employed for the last three months in a command commensurate with his rank in the Army. The committee thought that unjust, and unwise, and impolitic. Under the rules and regulations of the Army prior to 1862 an officer could not be mustered out of the service of the United States except upon report of a court-martial sanctioned by the President; but it was thought at that time that discretion should be lodged somewhere to muster unworthy officers out of the service, and Congress, by a general and sweeping law, conferred that power upon the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and that law is now in full force and full effect. It is proposed, however, by this bill now to take that power from the President, or if Senators prefer this statement of the case, to throw the responsibility upon Congress to do what the President has already been fully authorized to do by law.

This discretion must be lodged somewhere; and the question is whether it is more properly lodged with the Commander-in-Chief of the Army than with the Congress of the United States. Your officers in the field, your corps commanders, and division commanders, and commanders of departments, are required to report to the President through the Secretary of War, and they are supposed to know the efficiency and capacity of their officers, a knowledge which Congress, except from common report, the most fallible of all possible means of information, can never possess. Here is a bill aimed at what I admit is an abuse, the keeping in office of incompetent or unworthy officers. It is an abuse we wish to correct. We have already provided for its correction by giving to the President an unlimited discretion as to the mustering out of officers, and the discretion, it seems to me, is properly lodged with the President, because all the reports of the subaltern officers are made to him, and not to Congress. How are we to know whether an officer is incompetent or unfaithful except through reports of his superior commanders? Those reports only go to the President through the Department of the Secretary of War.

We are asked, then, to legislate in the dark, to muster out every man who has not been in active command commensurate with his rank for ninety days. Is the Senate prepared to take any such responsibility, to act in the dark? What does this bill effect in terms and in spirit? Who assigns these men to active command? First, the President may assign any officer in the Army to any command that he chooses under the law. Then the Secretary of War; then the corps commanders, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army in the field, and division commanders; and any one of these men may, by a stroke of the pen, strike out of existence any officer in the Army; and we are now required to do precisely that thing by an act of Congress.

This abuse is to be remedied—a great abuse; but how shall we remedy it most properly? By referring it to the Commander-in-Chief, I think. Whether it may be exercised properly and judiciously or not I am not prepared to say, for it does not, thank God, affect one single officer of the noble Commonwealth which I in part represent upon this floor. They have their proper and commensurate commands, and have stood nobly up to those commands upon a hundred battle-fields, from Cape Hatteras to the frontiers of Arkansas. I then have no personal interest in this matter, but I ask the Senate not by a sweeping act of legislation to strike out of existence some twenty or thirty officers without trial, who by possibility may have fallen under the displeasure of their division or their corps commanders or of the Secretary of War. It is not the way to remedy the evil. You have already done all that Congress is required to do; you have given the President that power, and it is his responsibility and not ours, and I am not willing to roll this responsibility off upon Congress and legislate in the dark, when no officer is compelled to report to us.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not agree fully with the honorable Senator from Indiana, that if this bill should be passed the entire responsibility will necessarily be taken from the executive department and thrown upon the Senate and House of Representatives, because, as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Illinois, there are three months within which the Executive and the War Department may save any generals to whom this can apply, if these departments deem them fit for public employment in the field; therefore, by the passage of this bill, the responsibility will be still divided, and will not be thrown upon the legislative department of the Government.

Now, sir, one word as to the origin and necessity of this act. It originated in the House of Representatives, I believe, early last session. Under what class of circumstances did it originate? Let us direct our attention to those circumstances. Early in the conduct of this war nominations for high ranks were easily obtained; the result was that inefficient men, men unable and unfit to conduct our armies to victory and success, obtained the highest rank in the Army, and the consequences were losses in every direction to the national cause. Why, sir, at a certain period during the last session of Congress we desired a new department commander for the Pacific department, and, anxious to send an officer there of good ability, of high military skill, that that country might be organized and prepared for an emergency likely to arise, possible at least to arise, I had several conferences with the Secretary of War; I had an examination with that officer of the long list of unemployed major generals and brigadier generals then under the pay of the Government and without public employment, and if I were at liberty here to repeat the comment that followed the name of each in those various conferences it would demonstrate the necessity of action somewhere to rid the country of the unnecessary and profitless burden that those gentlemen in high rank, holding high commissions under the Government, imposed upon it. It was five months before an officer deemed competent to send to that department could be selected by the exercise of the greatest wisdom from the long list of the then unemployed generals in the United States Army.

It was at that period of time, under that class of circumstances and facts, that this bill, or a like bill, originated in the House of Representatives, and was passed by that body. Pending the consideration of the measure before Congress, I was appealed to by the friends of generals out of employment, but yet in commission, more than once, lest it should pass, and their heads should thus drop into the basket. My answer was, the only one I could give, "My action upon this measure cannot depend upon its effect upon any officer in the employ of the Government." The executive department, it is true, has now full power to say whom it will employ, when they shall be employed, or whether it will employ them at all or not; but if this is the condition of things, if there are men doing nothing, and unfit to do anything, who are drawing hundreds of thousands of dollars from the public Treasury while we are nearly in a condition of public bankruptcy, and the executive department will not brush them out, as it should do, promptly and decidedly, then I say, as I said to them, "It is the duty of Congress, and I will perform my part of it, to rid the country of the incubus of gentlemen holding high rank and performing duties, in consideration of their pay, upon courts-martial and upon funeral occasions and other like occasions."

Sir, there was and is a necessity for the passage of such an act. Senators may, if they choose, argue that that necessity was begotten by the non-exercise of the power given by Congress to the executive department. I answer that thus: when any departments of this Government will not promptly perform the duty that is theirs, and exercise the power that Congress imposes upon them, I hold it to be still the additional duty of Congress to come forward and speak and act and see that that power is exercised. Congress is but in the pursuit, in my opinion, of the proper exercise of that power in the passage of the act now before us, and proposed to be indefinitely postponed by the honorable Committee on Military Affairs.

Why, sir, the list of unemployed general officers was so great as to preclude, as the honorable Senator from Illinois properly says, from public employment in high military capacities the best and noblest men that have been in the military service since this war began. I will direct the attention of the honorable Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to a single case; I have spoken about it elsewhere before this; I now undertake to speak of it here. A colonel commanding a Massachusetts regiment, whom I well know, a graduate of West Point, a man in the prime of life, a man full of animal life and full of moral and physical daring, full of courage, full of wisdom, full of military knowledge, led his regiment at the battle of Fredericksburg and stormed its heights where his men were cut to pieces, and he, himself, was almost cut to pieces; but afterward, recovering and regaining his health, and being again fit for the field, no manner of recommendation or presentation could secure a brigadier's commission for him, and he was mustered out of the service, and passed through the streets of Washington during the June days of last summer with the perspiration streaming from him as he led the noble little band of about one hundred and fifty that remained of his regiment back to their homes. I only state this as a single case. I can state another case. Recently we are informed that General Sherman has called for a particular officer to be sent to him in his department—I mean Colonel Bowman, who commands at Wilmington—because of his efficiency in a particular line of service, and than whom there is not a more intelligent, able, or honest man or officer in the employment of the United States. He cannot be sent. Why? He cannot get rank. Why? Because these miserable incumbrances are in the way. That is it, sir, and that is stated as the reason. The law permits but the nomination and appointment of a certain number of major and brigadier generals, and if that number is filled up, and from motives of delicacy or regard for the friends of those who secure the appointments the appointees are to be kept in commission without regard to their capacity, the result is that the noblest and most splendid material that we have within the country is kept out of its service, and the public interests are thus embarrassed, obstructed, and injured.

Now, sir, I happen to have no personal feeling in the case; but I cannot stand by and be the advocate of keeping any man in the public employment that the Government having the power to employ fails persistently to employ, and by that failure testifies to us his inability for high public employment.

I know, Mr. President, that it is a serious proposition to favor the passage of a bill the indefinite postponement of which is recommended by one of the highest committees of this body. I know that it is against the usage of the body, and I do not take position against the gentlemen composing the Military Committee, or against the committee's report, without doing it under great difficulty; but I most heartily join hands with the Senator from Illinois in the stand that he takes in favor of doing here what has been left undone by the executive department, but what is most necessary to the country shall be done; for, sir, the country and its services are worth more to us than the executive and all the other departments of the Government put together. The one you can reorganize and have again, for the country always furnishes material; but defeated upon the battlefields of the country in the present contest, you have no country and no Army reorganization.

Sir, I hope that this bill will not be voted upon to-day, but that it will be more seriously considered before a vote shall be taken, particularly a vote that shall result in its indefinite postponement. Let each department of the Government courageously do its part; and let us go further than that; let us press each other's department up to the performance of its duty, and then we can live against the world.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from California that he need have no delicacy in opposing the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in this case. The committee acted according to its best convictions. It presented its reasons to the Senate. If they are satisfactory I hope the Senate will sustain the committee in the indefinite postponement of the bill. If they are not, I hope the Senate will act up to its convictions, as the committee acted up to its idea of public duty.

We all admit, sir, that there are officers in commission as major generals and brigadier generals that ought to be mustered out of the service. Some of these officers are doing nothing, are out of employment. Others are attempting to do something; they are in employment, and some of our poorest officers of the country are to-day in the public service and ought to be mustered out. Some of the officers that are not in actual service ought to be mustered out, but not all of them. The responsibility is with the President of the United States, and the President ought to exercise the responsibility that rests upon him.

Several officers have been mustered out during the past year. Some, I think, have been mustered out within the last four or five weeks, or have resigned, knowing that otherwise they would be mustered out. All the facts in regard to the different officers are in the possession of the War Department, in the possession of the President of the United States; and in view of all the facts, in justice to the officers, and, above all, in justice to the country, the President ought to act. The responsibility is upon him, and I want him to take it, and I am not willing to shift the responsibility that belongs to him from him upon the Congress of the United States by the passage of a law which will allow any commander of an army, or any commander of a corps, to throw a general officer out of the service, with the expectation that by the lapse of time this law will punish him and dismiss him absolutely from the service.

I think, sir, that the passage of such a law will intensify and increase the rivalries and jealousies among the officers which already exist in the Army of the United States to a great extent. It is a fact, and we may as well admit it and act upon it, that in the Army there is more ambition, more rivalry, more jealousy, and more intrigue among high officers than there is in any other portion of our countrymen. I do not believe that in the most intensely excited political canvasses of our country the ambitions and rivalries that belong to public men in civil life bear any comparison to the jealousies and rivalries and ambitions that manifest themselves in the Army of the United States. And, sir, I know that to be the opinion of all men who are acquainted with the Army and acquainted with the civil affairs of the country, and they will tell you so. At present an officer may be thrown out of actual service by the reorganization of corps, or divisions, or brigades, or from some other cause. I think it is the duty of the Executive to see whether the officer is out of service for good cause, or whether he is out of service by an accident, or out of service by reason of the opposition, jealousy, rivalry, or ill-feeling of his superior officer, and to act so as to do justice to the individual, and at the same time take care of the interests of the country. We ought to suppose that by the President all these officers will be justly treated and the public service promoted. But now adopt this law, adopt this iron rule, and what will be the consequence? It is proposed to dismiss from the service those who are out of employment and have been so for three months. Some of them, I know, ought to be dismissed, but others ought not to be, and the very mention of their names would satisfy the Senate of that fact. Adopt this iron rule, dismiss them, and I think the effect in the Army will be to induce men in superior commands to crush out officers whom they do not like by putting them out of service, knowing that by the expiration of a certain time they will be dropped from the rolls by the standing law of the country. I think too much power already exists with the commanders of armies and of corps over the fortunes of officers under their command. Their power is great, necessarily great in the field, and it ought to be exercised justly, but it is not always so exercised. There are to-day able officers who are not in the public service, or, if in the public service, in positions where they ought not to be, owing to differences of opinion or rivalries on the part of officers who have been more fortunate than they, but who at one time were regarded as in no way their superiors.

Now, sir, I do not believe that justice will be promoted by the passage of this bill, and I doubt very much whether the public service can in any way be promoted by it. There is no doubt about the power of the President to dismiss an officer; he has been exercising it, and I think that he should exercise it on all proper occasions. The power is with him; the responsibility is with him, and I want him to bear it, and not shirk it or have any of his friends thrust it off upon a rigid iron rule adopted by Congress as a law. That, I think, was the view of the members of the Military Committee. We briefly stated in the report, which has been already read, our reasons for the recommendation we have made. I trust, at any rate, that the bill will not be passed without the greatest deliberation, and, in my judgment, it ought to be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I have looked into this bill somewhat, and I am very clearly of the opinion that the report of the Military Committee is correct, and I therefore hope that the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts will prevail.

The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from California have both stated to the Senate that there are very many incompetent officers out of employment who are receiving pay. I dare say that is the truth; but it is equally certain that the power to dismiss those parties from the service is now, by the law of the land, lodged in the President of the United States. I think that if the power to dismiss, without cause and without trial, is lodged anywhere, it should be with the President, and upon that high functionary devolves the duty; and he, and he alone, is, and should be, responsible to the country if inefficient men are kept in the service.

I understood from the Senator from Illinois that he thought that, perhaps, if these men were turned out it would lessen the number of officers of the rank of major general and brigadier general. I do not so understand the bill. It does not decrease the number of brigadier generals or major generals. The very bill before us provides that when these persons shall be dismissed in the manner provided by it, the vacancy thereby occasioned shall be filled by promotions or new appointments, as in other cases. If we were engaged in reducing the Army it would be eminently proper, as Congress has done in several cases heretofore, to pass laws regulating the matter; but the object of the bill is not to reduce the number of general officers, but to displace them whenever they have been out of service for the space of three months, and let their places be filled by other appointments.

I do not think that we should amend the present law upon this subject. By the statute passed in 1862 we clothed the President with the power of dismissal, without even having a military commission to investigate the conduct of the officer charged. I thought when that law was passed it was a great stretch of power; but such is the law, and the President has the power, before the setting of the sun, to strike from the rolls of the Army every incompetent man; and if he does not do it the responsibility rests upon him, and him alone.

He has the means of knowing whether they have discharged their functions properly more readily than the Senate has. As Senators have stated, the reports are all made to him through the War Office. I do not think that any man should be dismissed except for causes the most flagrant and almost self-evident, unless his conduct has first been investigated by a military court; but the law is not that way. That the President has the power to remove officers without trial we know from every day's practice. I fully concur with the Senator from Massachusetts when he says that the responsibility is on the President, and he should take it. I have no doubt that if these officers should be dismissed the President will exercise the power according to the present law; but if you pass this bill you place every officer in the Army who falls under the displeasure of a corps commander, or of the Secretary of War, at the disposal of either of those functionaries; and he may be put out of the service by being kept from active duty for three months. He will go out at the end of that time by the mere operation of the law. We never should lodge such a power with those authorities. The power should be vested in the President, and in no one else. If it is made known to him that an officer is out of the service, and is incompetent to reënter the service, it is his duty to dismiss him; and he is unworthy to be President, in times like these particularly, or, indeed, in any times, unless he will exercise the power in such a case. If he has doubts whether the party is inefficient and incompetent, let him call a court of inquiry to investigate the case, and let that court report to him so as to fully satisfy him, and then let him exercise the power. If it is a case in which he has no doubt about the incompetency of the man, let him decide without the intervention of a court of inquiry. He is now clothed with all the power necessary; and I think the report of the Military Committee is wise and eminently proper.

It was not my purpose in rising to go into any lengthy discussion of the bill, but merely to express in a very brief manner my views upon the subject. I shall vote for the indefinite postponement of the bill; and I think the Military Committee deserve the thanks of the country for the very prompt manner in which they have acted, and the very pointed and sensible report they have made on this subject. Let Mr. Lincoln, the President of the United States, if these parties are incompetent, turn them out of office and fill their places by competent men.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not allow myself very often to vote against a recommendation submitted here by the Committee on Military Affairs, and since I am called upon to do so at this time, I feel obliged to state as briefly as I can the reason why I shall do so. And I say in the outset that I am controlled by the facts and mainly by the logic submitted here by the committee. There is one conclusion of theirs with which I disagree, but all the rest of their report I cordially agree with. What is the position of the committee? It is, that a great abuse exists which imposes a heavy burden upon the Treasury and a great wrong upon our Army. This bill proposes to terminate it. If it is enacted, it will terminate that abuse. The abuse is that we have a large number of officers holding very high rank and drawing very heavy salaries and doing no work. If we say "ay" to this bill which is now before the Senate, that abuse will be terminated, it will be ended. The committee recommended, however, that we say "no" and not "ay," and the only reason, I believe, which they assign why we should thus vote is that we have already authorized the President of the United States to do the very thing that this bill proposes to do. Hence Senators say over and over again, "We have left the responsibility with the President; do not allow him to shirk it." Why, sir, I humbly conceive that we have not thrown the responsibility off ourselves at all. The President of the United States has no more power to do this thing than we have; all the authority he has he derived from us. Do we get rid of the responsibility ourselves when we authorize another agent of the Government to do this work? It ought to be done, say the committee; the abuse ought to be speedily remedied, say the committee; but they say, "We will not remedy it because we have authorized another agent of the Government to remedy it." But it is not remedied, and since the original power is in us, we are not discharged of that responsibility until we have applied that power and corrected the abuse. So long, therefore, as the committee tell me that the abuse exists, and tell me that by my vote I may correct it, I feel called upon to give my vote so that it will correct it.

But it is said that it is doing great injustice to those officers whose commissions will be taken away from them by the passage of this bill; it is said that it subjects them to the arbitrary control of corps, division, and army commanders, and of the Secretary of War. I conceive that it does no such thing. A division commander may arbitrarily and irrationally deprive the commander of a brigade of his command temporarily, but that order of his is not final; the President can correct it; and if the brigadier desires to retain his commission he has only to appeal to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and if he is fitted for it his command is given to him, which saves him from the operation of this bill.

They talk to us very touchingly about the disgrace to which officers are to be subjected by being hurled out of the Army under the iron rule of an act of the Legislature. Sir, when does disgrace fall upon an officer? Is it when he is struck from the pay-roll, or when he is struck out of the service of the Government? Is it when the paymaster says to him "I can give you your salary no longer," or is it when his superior officer tells him "You are no longer fit to command the armies of the United States?" I should suppose that an officer who was built upon the proper model would think that the last disgrace had fallen upon him when he was dismissed from his command; when he was told finally by ultimate authority that he was not fit to command. And I want to say further, that according to my understanding of the thing, the man who will submit to hold a commission and to draw his pay month after month and year after year after he has been told by the Government that he is not fit for the command that his rank would otherwise entitle him to, is not fit to hold any commission in the Army of the United States. If he has a proper spirit, when he is told authoritatively by the Government that he cannot be allowed to serve in its armies, he will tell the Government "I do not any longer want your pay."

This is no fanciful rule of action. I have seen it illustrated in the course of this war, and I take pleasure in saying that I know to-day of one officer who resides in the State of Wisconsin who once held the commission of a major general in your armies, who led your arms to victory at Iuka—a man without a bad habit and almost without a weakness in his profession, educated to the profession of arms, as gallant a man as I know—in point of fact weighing not less than one hundred and eighty-five pounds of concentrated chivalry and capacity; but the command of the very troops that he had led to victory was taken away from him. I think it was a grave error of judgment, not a malicious one, by any manner of means; but the command was taken away from him, and when he was told by the Government that he was not suitable to command, he told the Government that he was not worthy of their pay, and he tendered his resignation at once, which was accepted. I think any officer who feels accurately what belongs to his position would take the same course.

But what is the injustice that can be done? First, he is dismissed from his command. He is earning nothing for the Government. This bill, if it is enacted, proposes then to take away from him his commission. What does that do? It does not disgrace him, as I have said, because the disgrace has already been inflicted upon him. It takes away from him the responsibilities of an officer; it remits him to his usual employment, his usual avocation. It says to him, "You are no longer under any obligation to serve the Government of the United States, and therefore the Government of the United States does not pay you any more; go about your own pursuits." What is the injustice done him in the matter of dollars and cents? You deprive him simply of that excess which the Government pays him as a brigadier or major general over what he can earn as a private citizen. I believe that pretty much all of them tell us that they could earn a great deal more in private life than they get from the Treasury, and pretty much all of them tell us that they want their compensation increased. Upon their own theory, you are doing them only solid, substantial justice by saying to them "We will not keep you on our rolls any longer, we will not hold you under any obligation to serve us any longer; go about your own work, attend to your own business, make your own fortunes."

There is, therefore, no disgrace possible under the operations of the act, and, as it seems to me, no injustice of any kind possible under the operations of it. It will terminate that which the committee tell us is still a crying abuse, and is the only way we do absolutely know in which that abuse can be terminated. And yet Senators reason that no sort of responsibility attaches to them in the premises, although they may vote down a measure that will put an end to the very evil of which we all have so much reason to complain. I think I shall feel better satisfied with my own course if I vote in favor of the passage of the bill which will end the evil, rather than vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I occupy the same position with the Senator from Wisconsin who has just taken his seat. I will vote for this measure. I believe that Congress has unquestionable power to pass it, and that Congress ought to pass it. It has been a good while since I looked at that portion of our legislative history to which I am about to refer; but, according to my recollection, some time after the close of the last war with Great Britain Congress by its legislation provided for the reduction of the United States Army. At that time we had two major generals, General Brown and General Jackson; and the legislation of Congress was in such form that it arraigned General Jackson out of his office. That is my recollection; but I may not be entirely exact in relation to the facts. But, sir, I find in the Constitution this clause giving plain power to Congress to act upon the subject:

"The Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

Now, sir, what would be the effect of this bill if it were to pass? It would be simply to establish an additional rule and regulation for the government of the Army. It would provide that if a general officer is out of service for a certain length of time (and if the time named is too short it may be extended) the President shall be required to dismiss him from the service. It is admitted on all hands that this bill if passed will rid the Army and the Government of a large number of incompetent officers. If that would be the result it certainly ought to pass. Those officers were incompetent at the beginning; they are incompetent now. Their incompetence was just as well known when they were appointed as it is at this time. They were not appointed for military reasons, but they were appointed for political effect. The case, though, is stronger against them, because they have demonstrated in repeated fields of practical failure their utter incompetence for their commands; and notwithstanding the dishonor that is brought upon a high and chivalrous soldier, according to the principle suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, by having his name withdrawn from the list of high officers in actual command, they have had the callousness to hold on to their commissions and to their stations merely for emolument, regardless of the true honor of a soldier. Now, I say that these men ought to be reached; they ought to be displaced from positions in which they are drawing high salaries, and which they are altogether incompetent to fill.

I concede that the President had the power before the passage of the law adverted to by the honorable Senator from Indiana to dismiss these men from office. I think so; not by any legislation, I admit, but I maintain that he had the power as Commander-in-Chief. Waiving, however, that point, the act to which my honorable friend has referred gives him the plain and unquestioned right to dismiss these men. He ought to have done so before this. It was incumbent upon him to do so, I think, in the proper performance of his duty. It was his own act that placed incompetent men in office; and when their incompetence was demonstrated by repeated failures, and the Congress of the United States had authorized and instructed him by a positive law to dismiss them from office, he ought to have stood up to the performance of his duty, and he ought to have dismissed them from offices which they were unable to fill.

Sir, I wish this measure could have a more speedy operation, and I would like to have it apply to some men who have been in the service for the last three months, as well as some who have been out of it. The great incompetent, whose cowardice and want of military capacity has brought nothing but discomfiture and dishonor upon his country's arms from the battle of Big Bethel to the siege of Fort Fisher, ought to walk the plank under some such regulation as this; and not only he, but many others.

I think that the members of the House of Representatives who got up this measure, and whose persevering advocacy succeeded in passing it through that House, deserve the commendation of Congress and of the country; and instead of the bill being postponed indefinitely, I think it ought to be taken up and passed by the Senate. And, sir, I am in favor of it for a greater and a much more important consideration than any which has yet been adverted to. The Congress of the United States have the power to raise and disband armies; they have the power to authorize and to create offices; they have the power to abolish those offices, and to remove, by the abolition of an office, the officer from it. They have a right, by their repeal of laws passed, or by a modification of existing laws, to disband armies, and, in my judgment, it is going to become the most momentous question of the day, of the country, and of the Government, how far this power of disbanding armies shall be exercised by Congress. The time is approaching, I hope, when we shall have peace in the land, when the rebellion will be put down, when the authority of the United States will be reasserted in all the States and in every square foot of territory of the United States. When that time comes it will leave in the field and in the service of the nation from half a million to a million of men in arms. How can you, safely for the country, safely for its liberties, for its Constitution, and for its Government, and for the public welfare, disband such a vast army? It is one of the gravest questions, in my judgment, that will commend itself hereafter to the serious attention of American statesmen and legislators.

We all know the esprit du corps of military men. We all know how the officers and soldiers of an army become attached to their profession, and the feeling is now growing and being consummated in the country that the Army is the profession of the men who now constitute it. They are looking to it for their future support. The officers are looking to it for promotion, for additional authority and compensation and consideration by promotion. The privates and all who are attached to the Army are looking to it as their profession, distinct from the other professions in the country. They are looking to it as a matter in which they have a peculiar interest, an interest steady, chivalrous, and persevering as that which has always characterized the votaries of all the armies of all the countries of the earth to their profession, to their army.

I want the Congress of the United States to familiarize themselves with the power by its exercise. I want them to understand and appreciate that they have an unlimited discretion and right to legislate in relation to the Army, and in relation to the repeal of laws authorizing the organization of the Army, either in its men or its officers, and a full right to pass laws to dispose of that Army, and to disband it by the peaceful legislation of the law-making power. The time is coming when that power will have to be exercised; and whether it will be permitted by the Army to be peacefully exercised for the good of the country and the maintenance in perpetuity of the Government and the liberties of the people is a question that is fraught with immense doubt and difficulty in my mind, and I fear that that doubt and difficulty will become practical and obvious to the whole land in the course of a very few years.

I have merely adverted to this as the leading idea upon which I am induced to give my support to this measure. If the measure is wrong in any of its details, if it will work injustice or injury to meritorious men, let the bill be referred back to the same committee or to the Committee on the Judiciary, and there let it be amended so that no such injurious results to individuals can arise from it. But, sir, when the country is about to come into a condition where the principle involved in this measure will be of immeasurable importance to our Government and people, to give it the go-by by an indefinite postponement would in my judgment be eminently unjust both to the country and to Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I was gratified when the committee made this report. I had hoped that it would have satisfied the judgment of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I always listen to the Senator from Kentucky with pleasure, but the argument which he has presented has failed to satisfy me that the committee in their recommendation are wrong. Indeed, I think the Senator has met his own argument. He says that the officers coming within the provisions of this bill who are found unworthy of the public service ought to be immediately dismissed. That is very true; all Senators will agree to that proposition; but is the Senator right sure that officers not qualified for the rank which they have attained are found in larger numbers out of service than those having commands at this time?

The Senator has illustrated to some extent by a reference to a very distinguished military commander who sent a force to Bethel and recently commanded at Fort Fisher, and the Senator says that that commander ought to be dismissed from the service. I am not going to controvert his position in that regard; but this bill will not reach him. This bill will not reach another distinguished commander who lost an army in the department of Louisiana last year under circumstances that shocked the whole country. This bill will not reach another commander wearing one star that I know of, who has two or three times been ordered to the front, as is understood, yet, because he could command a political influence here in Washington, has been allowed to discharge duties that ought to be discharged by a provost marshal alone for two years since he has been made brigadier. I think, sir, if we run over the whole list of officers we shall find more men who have been able to command political power and influence enough to hold them in command than men out of command to-day who are unfit for the service.

I understand that prior to 1862 the President of the United States possessed the power to dismiss from the Army any officer, but the usage had been so uniform that the President should not so dismiss except upon a finding of a court-martial or court of inquiry, that it became almost the common law of the Army, and the President dared not, in the presence of the Army dismiss a man without the support of the finding of some military court. The act of 1862 was intended to relieve him from that embarrassment, as I understand, and to allow him arbitrarily, and without reason, to dismiss an officer from the public service. That power has been exercised. It is now possessed to the broadest extent. I dare say that Senators at the time observed the remarkable exercise of this power in respect to a lieutenant in New Hampshire. I happen to have in my drawer the order:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, March 13, 1863.

[Special Order, No. 119.]

33. By direction of the President the following officers are hereby dismissed the service of the United States:

* Lieutenant A. G. Edgerly, fourth New Hampshire volunteers, for circulating copperhead tickets. *

By order of the Secretary of War:
L. THOMAS, Adjutant General.
To the GOVERNOR OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

No reason is given connected with the service of this lieutenant, and I take it no reason could be found for his dismissal connected with the service, else it would have been assigned. A political reason alone could be assigned. I am not going to comment upon the language that is here used, which ought not to be found in any mouth except that of a scavenger who does the dirty work of a political party; nor am I going to speak of the hardship done to the lieutenant, who, I understand, had stood in the roughest scenes of battle, and carried upon his body wounds received in the public service. I think the order could not have been known to the President, and I hope not to the Secretary of War. I allude to it simply to show that the President now, by the action of Congress, is clothed with power to dismiss officers from the service without a reason, and that that power has been exercised in the case of not a very high officer, but one against whom I understand no accusation could be brought, or else that accusation would have found its way into this order instead of a political reason.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pause to allow the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

THANKS TO GENERAL W. T. SHERMAN.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 131) tendering the thanks of the people and of Congress to Major General William T. Sherman, and the officers and soldiers of his command, for their gallant conduct in their late brilliant movement through Georgia.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If my colleague will pardon me for a moment, I desire to ask the Senate to take up the resolution of thanks to General Sherman and his army, which has just come from the House of Representatives, for the purpose of having it passed immediately.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that that joint resolution be taken up and passed at once, without reference to a committee, for I think the country understands it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the resolution just communicated from the House of Representatives. Is there any objection?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we referred the other resolutions in regard to the Lieutenant General and Admiral Farragut, and this had better take the usual course.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. In some instances we have referred such resolutions and in some not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to proceeding to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) tendering the thanks of the people and of Congress to Major General William T. Sherman, and the officers and soldiers of his command, for their gallant conduct in their late brilliant movement through Georgia, was read twice.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it now proper to move to commit the resolution? I believe the proper stage for that motion is when the joint resolution has been read a second time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to refer is now in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; and in making that motion I wish to say that I do so in accordance with what I think has been the practice of the Senate, and not because I have any opposition to the resolution. The whole country appreciates—I certainly do—the distinguished services of Major General Sherman; but I think we had better not take the resolution out of the ordinary course. The committee can report it back to-morrow. The reference will not delay it. I think we pursued a similar course in regard to the resolutions of thanks to the other high officers to whom we have tendered the thanks of Congress. It is simply with that view, and not out of hostility to the resolution, that I make the motion to refer.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has not been the uniform course to refer resolutions of this description to a committee; and even if it was a general rule to make such a reference, there are certainly occasions which should be considered exceptional, and if there could be any exception to a rule of that description, admitting a general rule to exist, it is furnished, perhaps, by the case before the Senate. Not only was the campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta almost unrivaled for the gallantry and skill displayed, and its successful termination, but the progress of the march from Atlanta through Georgia a distance of three hundred miles, with an army of fifty or sixty thousand men, without losing a man hardly, and finally capturing the city of Savannah without firing a gun, will, in the history of military affairs, the world over, be considered not only as without example, but as an achievement that the imagination of man, in advance, hardly thought to be possible. Not only did the press of this country look upon that march with the greatest solicitude, but the European press, the military press of England as well as of France thought that it was a dubious undertaking, and would, in all human probability, terminate in defeat. It has, however, terminated most brilliantly and successfully, and it has not merely terminated in the example of a brilliant military achievement, but it seems from the indications of the day to have brought about very strong grounds for believing that it will contribute very largely to putting an end to the rebellion. We see by the papers of to-day that the citizens of Savannah, nearly all of whom have remained, (for the population of the city is said to be now some twenty or twenty-five thousand, and it never exceeded the latter number,) are rallying around the standard planted by Sherman in their midst, and are anxious to return to its protection, and have petitioned the Governor of the State to call a convention for the purpose of considering whether it is not the interest, as well as the high moral and political duty of the State herself, to lay down her arms and again become one of the United States, protected by the Constitution and by the banner known to the Constitution.

A word more, sir, and I shall take my seat. However proper it might have been, even if there was a uniform rule, to make the reference suggested by the Senator from Illinois, yet as the motion of the Senator from Indiana was to take the resolution up that it might be acted upon at once, a delay now in acting upon it, (although I am sure such is not the motive that governs the Senator from Illinois or would govern any other member of the Senate,) would be considered perhaps by the public as an intimation or an indication that there was on the part of some one member of the Senate an unwillingness to award this tribute to that gallant officer and his men.

For these reasons I trust that my friend from Illinois will withdraw his motion, or if he cannot consent to do that from the sense of duty, which I am sure actuates him, that the Senate will refuse the reference.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, the thanks of Congress to an officer for gallant service I deem to be an honor and a great honor; but it is only when they are cordially, and without hesitation, offered. If we are to hesitate and higgie about thanking an officer or an army, I think we had better do nothing about it. I hope we shall act upon this resolution without a reference.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, when General Sherman cut loose from Atlanta, and marched upon the coast, it was said that he violated all the proprieties and rules of the military service. I would be glad, in this instance, to violate the practice of the Senate, and give him the thanks of Congress at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, it is a very unpleasant position for a member of the Senate to be placed in, to endeavor to preserve its rules and regulations and ordinary course of proceeding in a case like this. It is a very awkward position to object to giving the thanks of Congress to any of our gallant officers who have performed valuable service in the field, when the motion is made. We have had several motions of this character since this war began; and it has been said in the Senate and it has been thought that it would be more complimentary to the officer that the thanks of Congress should be deliberately expressed rather than that in the excitement of the moment when a resolution is introduced the vote should be taken upon it immediately. I presume that this resolution will receive the unanimous vote of this body, the vote of every member in it; but if you pass it now in this way, some Senator to-morrow may propose a vote of thanks to another officer and call upon the Senate to act on it immediately, and will anybody object then to immediate action? You will now have adopted the principle of allowing these resolutions to go through without receiving the ordinary consideration of Congress; and having adopted that rule, then if a member of the Senate objects he will be understood as hostile to the vote of thanks.

Notwithstanding what the Senator from Maryland has said would be understood by the country, there can be no such understanding in this case. I took occasion to state distinctly, when I moved to refer this resolution, that the country acknowledged the gallant services of General Sherman, that I certainly did, and that the motion was made with no such view, but with a view to make these thanks, when they are given, worth something, not to cheapen the thanks of Congress and have them given on mere motion without consideration, but let the deliberate thanks of the representatives of the people and of the States be given to this commander after consideration. There is no haste about this, whether it is to-day or to-morrow. Let the resolution come back to-morrow reported by the Senator from Indiana with the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Military Affairs, and let us then give it the unanimous sanction of the Senate. I think it would then be more valuable. I think that is the course which the Senate ought to adopt upon this occasion; but I shall not vote against the resolution of thanks because it is pressed to a vote to-day, if the Senate think proper to do so, for whenever the question comes I shall vote for the resolution, and am quite as much for it as any of those gentlemen who would hasten it through without its taking the ordinary course, and I think the usual course would be more complimentary to the gallant commander whom it is intended to compliment than if the resolution is passed in this hasty and, perhaps I may say, indecent way.

Mr. DAVIS. I concur in everything that the honorable Senator from Illinois has said. There is not a member of this body that will give a more cordial vote in favor of the resolution than I will, because I believe that the gallant general who is made its subject has rendered more brilliant and important service to his country in the conduct of the armies than any other who is now or has been heretofore in the service; but notwithstanding that is my opinion I would much prefer that this resolution should pass in the order and with the deliberation that would give it the highest moral value to the hero whom it is intended to honor, and that it would be most acceptable to his feelings, and I think if it was done deliberately it would have more effect upon his just estimate of the tribute than by its being hurried through the Senate.

The motion to refer was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed unanimously.

UNEMPLOYED GENERALS—AGAIN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 586) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Wilson to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. HENDRICKS. By the act of 1862 all officers of the Army were made dependent directly upon the pleasure of the President for their positions. In order to hold their positions, as well as to secure promotion, they had to be in favor at the city of Washington. I do not believe that the public service was promoted thereby; but the President in the exercise of the power conferred upon him by that law was answerable directly to the country. If he dismissed a man high in command, the friends of that individual would to some extent vindicate his reputation, if it was an arbitrary and unjust act; and therefore there was some security to the officer even in the exercise of so high a power as that law confers. But what is now proposed? Not to do this thing directly, but indirectly. The Secretary of War, desiring to strike at some officer in the Army (if such a thing can be presumed) will not dismiss the officer, which would attract public attention, and would rally his friends to his vindication, but will simply withdraw him from command. The country may say "For the time being the services of this man are not required, there is no place for him." That might be the judgment for the time being of the country; but at the end of three months this man is found out of the service by an indirect proceeding, and the responsibility attaches nowhere. I say, sir, that under such a law the honor of the officer in the field is not safe. I prefer that the arbitrary power shall be possessed by the President, to be exercised under his responsibility to the country, rather than to enact a sweeping law like this. I shall vote for the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, when this bill was first brought to the consideration of the Senate to-day I had not had time to look into the law to see what the precedents had been, nor to consider the phraseology of the bill very particularly. Since the discussion has been going on I have looked back at the former legislation of Congress somewhat, and have examined the bill more carefully. Now, sir, I cannot expect, with this unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs, that anything I may say will be likely to change their opinion, or what will probably be the opinion of the Senate; but I wish to come back to the evil which is complained of and to show to Senators, if they will give me their attention, and to the country, the exact position which we occupy in defeating this bill; to show that so far from the bill being inconsistent with precedent it is sustained by the direct action of Congress at a former period of the history of the Government; that it is a duty as much incumbent upon us as upon the Executive to remedy an evil, and the committee themselves, in their own report, confess that it is an evil which ought to be remedied.

Now, sir, what say this committee unanimously? The Committee on Military Affairs say that "many general officers in the regular and volunteer forces of the Army of the United States have been and now are unemployed, or not on duty corresponding with their rank." The Committee on Military Affairs unanimously say that these officers "hold commissions and draw pay and allowances without any equivalent service rendered to the Government;" and the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously say that "at the same time these officers stand in the way of the promotion and consequent increase of compensation of the officers of inferior grade who are performing the duties proper to such general officers." The Committee on Military Affairs further say that "this is burdensome to the Treasury, unjust to meritorious officers in the field, and should be speedily remedied;" yet they propose to do nothing to remedy it. The Committee on Military Affairs further say that—

"Economy, justice, and the efficiency and general interests of the military service alike demand that where general officers in the regular and volunteer forces of the United States are found to be unfit for commands, and who are consequently unemployed or employed on duty not corresponding to their rank, they should be mustered out of the service, and that the vacancies thus created should be filled by new promotions and appointments, in order that the officers of an inferior grade who are performing the duties proper to such general officers may be promoted to the rank and receive the pay, allowances, and emoluments of such general officers."

After stating that, after recapitulating the evil, saying that economy and justice and the efficiency and general interests of the military service require that this evil should be remedied, what is the conclusion? Therefore we, the Committee on Military Affairs, recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill which proposes to remedy it! That is the logic. That is exactly what the committee recommend. We acknowledge the evil, and therefore we propose indefinitely to postpone the bill which will remedy it! Why? Because the President of the United States has the power to remedy it. Well, sir, but he does not exercise his power. You say in your report that he does not; that these men are holding office; you remit it to the President, as you have been remitting it to him, and it has not been done. The evil exists. The efficiency of the military service requires it to be remedied. You have the power to remedy it; but somebody else has the power; and because somebody else will not exercise it, therefore we will not exercise it, but will let the military service suffer and let unemployed officers receive pay, let injustice be done to inferior officers who are performing the duty which belongs to those superiors; we will not remedy it though we have the power, because, forsooth, the President of the United States has the power, and yet he will not remedy it! Is not that the position? Can we go before the country, can we go before officers of the Army, can we do justice to ourselves while we occupy such a position?

I have before me a letter from the Secretary of War, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 31st of March last, in which he states that there were in the service of the Government of the United States one hundred and sixty-two colonels commanding brigades and divisions in your Army. One hundred and sixty-two colonels; the very men who have led your brigades and your divisions in battle, who have borne your flag in triumph from the mouth of the Ohio to the Gulf, and from Atlanta to Savannah, who have carried your flag to the heart of Arkansas, and have nearly crushed out this rebellion; and for two years and more, many of them bearing wounds upon their person, and having led divisions in battle time and again, are not permitted to have either the rank or the pay of a general, because somebody else at home in the State of Illinois or the State of New Hampshire or the State of Massachusetts, draws the pay and has the rank of general! Is this right? And shall we stand here quibbling whether we shall do our duty and complain of the Executive that he does not do his? Sir, let us go along hand in hand with the Executive; let us move on shoulder to shoulder with the Executive; and if he fails in any of the great responsibilities devolved upon him, and we have the power to uphold his hands, let us exercise and assert that power.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Will the Senator pardon me for one moment? This bill, if it passes, does not compel the mustering out of service of anybody. It only provides for mustering out of service those who are not employed for three months. Who has the right to employ them? The President has the right to assign them to commands or not, precisely as he pleases, and so has the corps commander and the department commander; and, after all, the discretion rests with the President; and your bill is utterly ineffective unless the President chooses to carry it out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What, then, becomes of this complaint of an arbitrary rule, and this talk of a Procrustean bed that is to be applied to everybody, and to strike men out at the end of three months at any rate? What becomes of the argument of the Senator from Iowa, whom I am sorry not to see now in his seat [Mr. GRIMES] that this was an arbitrary rule; and of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL;] and I had almost said, of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana himself, but I am not sure that he made use of that argument? We have been told that this is an arbitrary rule to dismiss men from the service; and now, lo and behold! it is merely a bill leaving it, after all, to the discretion of the President. I think this bill would amount to something. I agree that a discretion is left by the bill to the Executive, and it does not dismiss from the public service every officer who has been unemployed for three months. It provides expressly that "no officer is to be considered as included in the foregoing provision whose absence from duty shall have been occasioned by wounds received or disease contracted in the line of his duty while in the military service of the United States, or by his being a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy, or under parole." It does not provide for dismissing any of these persons who are thus disabled from performing their duty. It applies only to such as shall have been continuously out of the service for three months prior to the 15th day of February, 1865. If the President wishes to retain in the service any of these officers who are not now performing actual service, it is easy enough for him to give them employment between now and the 15th of February; or, if that is too soon, put it the 4th day of July next. It is not the detail of the bill that is objected to, but the principle of the bill is objected to by the Military Committee. For myself, whenever there is evil existing in the country, and the legislative authority has the power to correct that evil, I hold it to be our duty to exercise that power.

But it has been said that some division commander may retire a man from service for three months, and then he will be dropped by the effect of this bill. How can a division commander retire him from service after the passage of the bill any more than now? This bill gives him no additional power to retire a general from service. If the division commander is that unjust officer represented here, actuated by malicious and improper motives, he can retire a general now as well as he can after the passage of this bill; and will you gain anything by keeping that general officer in your pay, and holding the rank while another performs the duty? It seems to me not.

But, sir, it has seemed to be supposed that this was unprecedented; and such was the view of the Senator from Iowa. This bill, drawn, as I think, with very considerable care, and which comes to us with the indorsement of the House of Representatives, the immediate representatives of the people, designed to correct an admitted evil, does not arbitrarily muster these officers out of service. It leaves it, as the Senator from Indiana has well remarked, at last in the discretion of the President, but it controls that discretion to some extent. It enables him to determine which shall go out, and it compels the leaving of the service by men whom he will not place in positions to discharge duties corresponding to the ranks they hold. Now, sir, what was the legislation of 1815, soon after the close of the last war with England? I ask the attention of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] who seems so anxious to throw responsibility upon the President to this provision of the law. The fifth section of the act of March 3, 1815, declares:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States cause to be arranged the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the several corps of troops now in the service of the United States in such a manner as to form and complete out of the same the corps authorized by this act, and cause the supernumerary officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates to be discharged from the service of the United States from and after the 1st day of May next, or as soon as circumstances may permit."

Here was a law requiring the President, by a certain day, to dismiss a portion of the Army, just as the bill now under consideration requires that by a certain day, unless the President, in his discretion, puts these officers into command, they shall go out of the service. The law of 1815 directed that the President should arrange the officers of the Army, and should, by a certain day, dismiss the supernumeraries. In principle, how do these laws differ? There is a precedent for the action contemplated by this bill. The principle is the same. The present bill does not use the word "discretion," but the Senator from Indiana admits that it is left at last in the discretion of the President, because, he says, it is competent for the President to put the officer in command, and then he cannot be mustered out. He has the discretion, therefore, but this will stimulate the activity of the President.

The effect of this bill will be to give place to deserving officers. I can use no better language than the committee themselves have used for the purpose of showing the necessity of the passage of just such a bill as this. I am in favor of it because I want to do justice to meritorious officers in the field. This is the great motive with me. I confess it would be a sufficient motive to be able to discharge from the service men who are drawing pay and holding rank and rendering no service to the country; but I am actuated by another motive in wishing the passage of this bill. I want your gallant commanders recognized; I want your colonels, near two hundred of them who have performed the duties of these idle generals for two years and more, exposing their persons upon every battle-field, to have the rank, and I want to give them the pay belonging to the duties they have performed. I want to take from their shoulders the eagle and place upon them the stars they have earned; and, sir, in their behalf, in behalf of the Army and the good of the public service, in the language of the report of this committee, I ask Senators to pass this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say to the Senator from Illinois that the committee admit, as they have stated in their report, that incompetent officers ought to be dismissed, not officers out of employment, but incompetent officers. I do not think the fact that an officer is out of employment for a few weeks an evidence that he ought to be dismissed from the public service; and I think that any person who will look at the record, at the names of the officers now out of employment, will say that all of those officers ought not to be dismissed. Some of them are among our bravest and our best officers, men who have distinguished themselves on many a battle-field. There are officers to-day in the service of the United States in the field who ought not to be in that service, men who are admitted on all hands to be inferior officers.

The position of the committee is this: that incompetent officers ought to be mustered out of the service, whether they are now in service, or not in service; and the committee go further, and say this on the ground of the good of the public service, and as an act to make way for deserving inferior officers. But the committee take this position, that the President of the United States is clothed with ample powers now on this subject; that he is the responsible man, and ought to be held to his just responsibility.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire if the President has any more authority over this thing than we have?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. On the 17th of July, 1862, Congress passed "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes." The seventeenth section of that act is in these words:

"That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and requested to dismiss and discharge from the military service either in the Army, Navy, Marine corps, or volunteer force in the United States service, any officer for any cause which, in his judgment, either renders such officer unsuitable for or whose dismissal would promote the public service."

There is the law saying to the President of the United States, "You are authorized to dismiss any officer in the service, and you are requested to do it if, in your judgment, the public good will be promoted by so doing." There is his warrant of action; there is the authority; there is the request of the Congress of the United States; and if there is a man to-day in the public service, or in commission who is not in service, who is unworthy of the commission he bears, the responsibility is with the President of the United States, and not with Congress. I do not wish to relieve the President of that responsibility. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army; he has the means of knowing the worth of every officer in the military and naval service of the country; he has all the means of information; and let him exercise it according to his sense of justice and his sense of public duty.

It is now proposed to relieve the President from this responsibility. We all say that there are officers in the service who ought to be mustered out. I admit that most of the general officers to be reached by this bill, if it should pass, ought to be mustered out of the service at once, but there are several of those officers whom everybody would say ought not to be. Now, sir, if you leave it with the President, let him exercise it. I understand that several were dismissed but a few weeks ago, and that with regard to some dozen or fifteen others, the matter is in course of examination, and they will be discharged probably in a very short time. I think there are some men who are employed in the service to-day, who would not be reached by this bill, who ought to go also, and I believe that to be the judgment of the War Department and of the officers in the field who know the worth of these men.

Nobody doubts that we have the authority to pass this bill. The simple question is, whether we ought to pass it; whether we ought to adopt this iron rule, and put on the law the responsibility that now belongs to the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, who ought to exercise in all these matters a wise discretion, governed by a sense of public duty and of justice to officers. I believe that the passage of this bill will do injustice to some men who are now out of employment, and will do injustice in its operation in the future on men who are now in the service, and who may be put in this position in order to work them out of the public service, when the President, or no man responsible to the country, would muster them out of the service, and then the responsibility of injustice, if injustice should be done, will rest upon the law, upon the action of the Congress of the United States.

The question of our power to pass such a bill has been referred to, and the Senator from Illinois brings in here an act passed in 1815 when the Army of the United States was reduced. We do not propose to reduce the number of general officers. We have seventy major generals of volunteers and two hundred and seventy-five brigadier generals of volunteers. It is not proposed to reduce the number. It is simply to muster some out in order to make room for the promotion of others.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] referred to what he regarded as a sort of question about the reduction of the Army by Congress. I do not believe there is any question about that. If the war closed to-day, there would be no difficulty here in reducing the Army to the size Congress believed the good of the country required.

I do not believe that is a possible disturbing question in the country. I believe that nearly all the soldiers and an overwhelming majority of the officers of the Army would be glad to-day if the war closed and they could retire to the duties of private life.

There is no occasion to pass this bill in order to exercise the authority of Congress over the Army, or to show that Congress ought to direct and control the President. Congress has given him all the power now. He is clothed with it. We have reelected him President of the United States, and I am for holding him to his just responsibility on this and on all other questions, and not, because he shall fail to do what we believe to be his duty, come in here and pass a law that shall relieve the President and put the burden upon us, or upon a law that we choose to pass. I do not, for one, wish to relieve him from any of the just responsibilities of the high position to which he has been reelected. Therefore, sir, I believe it wise not to pass this bill, but to leave the matter as it is, and let the President of the United States take the responsibility that the law of the country now devolves upon him.

Mr. FARWELL. I am somewhat embarrassed about voting upon this question. The committee state in their report that there are many officers who ought to be relieved from the service. The law authorizing the President to dismiss these officers has been upon the statute-book for over two years, and he has not, it appears, acted upon that law even to the satisfaction of the committee. I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the honorable chairman of the committee that he withdraw his motion to indefinitely postpone the bill, and then let us postpone its further consideration for thirty days. I believe if the President shall neglect or refuse to act under that law, and dismiss from the service officers whom the good of the service and justice to men of inferior rank in the service require should be dismissed, that then it will be the duty of Congress to take this matter in hand and act for themselves. The discussion of this matter perhaps will call the attention of the Executive, the Commander-in-Chief, to it. His duties are very severe; he calls upon his time for the consideration of various subjects must engross it nearly all; but the discussion which has been held here to-day will undoubtedly call his attention to this matter, and I trust that such action will be taken upon it as shall satisfy the Senate that the postponement of it was a wise measure. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion, and then I will make a motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, at one time it was a question of doubt whether the President of the United States had the authority as President, without legislative sanction, to remove an officer of the Army. The general practice was not to take a step of that sort without a preceding court of inquiry or a court-martial. But the better opinion, as well as I recollect, or what was supposed to be the better opinion, was that the officers of the Army stood toward the President in the same relation in which the civil officers of the country stand, that although they are appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, they could be removed by the President alone; and the President frequently, or occasionally, I know, has exercised that power. There was a case that excited a good deal of interest, as the Senate will remember when I mention it, because of the particular circumstances attending it, in which General Jackson exercised that power. In going from here to Alexandria on board a steamboat, he was very rudely assaulted by a lieutenant in the Navy or in the Marine corps, I forget which, a Lieutenant Randolph. He offered him a very gross indignity, and the President at once struck him from the roll. In several other cases the President has done the same thing.

But, although it has been done occasionally, when the act of 1862 was passed there was an impression that it could not be done except under the authority of some act of Congress, and to give the power so as to satisfy those who thought that the power did not exist without legislation, or to satisfy those who doubted whether the power existed, the act of 1862 was passed, and, as the Senate have seen from the reading of that act, it gives to the President the right, without any cause, if he in his judgment thinks the public service demands it, to dismiss any officer of the Army or Navy or the Marine corps, and I suppose since the passage of that act there can be no doubt that the President possesses the power.

I can very readily see that it might become a question whether Congress has the authority to pass such a bill as the one upon its table. My own opinion is that it has that power; but it may be considered, and perhaps would be considered by some, that the power which Congress would assume to exercise by a bill of that description is in its nature an executive power, and, as all executive power by the Constitution is vested in the President, that it would be an interference with the executive prerogative.

What was done by the act referred to by the honorable member from Illinois was not what is proposed to be done by this bill. The cases are entirely unlike. Congress then determined that the public service demanded that the Army itself should be diminished. We had gone through the war of 1812, and we had come out of that war with an army not demanded by a state of peace. It was necessary, therefore, to diminish the Army; and in order to accomplish that purpose Congress passed the law referred to by the honorable member from Illinois, as the President, without legislation, would have no authority to that extent. He might dismiss the officers under his executive authority if he thought they were unfit to discharge the duties pertaining to the office, but he could not disband the Army. The Army, therefore, would have remained until Congress by its own legislation should direct that it should be disbanded. What they did by the act of 1815 was merely to provide a mode by which the Army should be diminished, and it did it by authorizing the President to arrange the different officers who were then in the service, the Army being about to be diminished, and to retain only such a number as would be found necessary for the Army as it was about to be reduced, and of course to dismiss the rest.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me to interrupt him, my recollection may be at fault; but did not an act of Congress authorize a certain board to be constituted, consisting of officers of the Army, and perhaps some civilians with them; and had not that board certain authority in relation to the disposition of officers?

Mr. JOHNSON. It did; but that is not the act of 1816; that is another one. The act of 1816, if I recollect aright, and I think I do, gives to the President the authority to dispose of the officers as he thinks proper, without any preliminary inquiry.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My recollection is that General Scott was a member of such a board.

Mr. JOHNSON. There has been a board at different periods when the Army has been lessened to decide what officers should be retained and what should not.

But this bill is not for the purpose of diminishing the Army. It assumes that the Army is not too large. It therefore assumes that the number of officers already in service is not too large. But it provides that if any portion of those officers necessary to the service in point of number are not called into actual service to a command suited to their respective ranks, and remain in that condition for three months, they are then to be dropped.

I do not know what the President would do if a bill like this was passed; but I think I am not mistaken in the opinion of what he should do. You have given him the power by the act of 1862 to strike from the rolls of the Army every incompetent man, and if this bill is offered to him, and he sees that he is not to decide whether they are incompetent or not, that you will decide it, and if the officer from any cause whatever, no matter what, whether with reference to his competency to the command, or from any other cause, is not in actual service commanding such a command as is suited to his rank, he must be dropped, I think he ought to say, "I have got the power to drop him now; I think this is a reflection upon me, whether designed by Congress or not; you have by your act of 1862 quieted all doubts upon the subject of my power, if there were any well-founded doubts before; you have told me that you give me the authority; I am now keeping in service these men, and you interpose a bill now which says virtually to me that I am not doing my duty; I cannot approve of a bill that carries with it such a reflection upon myself."

Mr. President, I am far from believing, notwithstanding the very positive manner in which it has been stated, that the President has not done his duty. Gentlemen assume that there are officers now in the Army of the United States who are not worthy to be there, and whose dismissal is called for by the interest of the public. How do we know that? How am I to know it? By public rumor? Who is the man vested with the means of ascertaining whether they are fit for the service or not? Is it not the President himself? And if he thinks proper to keep them in the service of the United States, unless the absolute necessities of the country demand it, is it toward him decorous—I speak it with no sense to find fault with the Senators who advocate this bill, or the House of Representatives who have adopted it—is it decorous to the Executive to say, "You are now failing in a clear and obvious duty; you are keeping now in the military service of the country at this period, when the life of the nation is at stake and depending upon the success of your armies, incompetent men, and we are compelled by a sense of duty to the nation, in order to save the nation from the peril in which it is, to assume ourselves the authority which it is your duty to exercise, which we have authorized you to exercise, but which we see that you will not exercise?"

The honorable gentleman from Illinois says he wants the bill passed because it would stimulate the President to do what the President ought to do. Sir, if a high sense of official duty, if his sworn official duty, if his obligations to the true honor and necessities of the country, are not sufficient to stimulate him to the discharge of his duty, he will not be stimulated by anything you can do. He may leave these officers to go out under the operation of your bill, and if he is capable of keeping in the service officers who are unfit, then when they go out, and they and their friends appeal to him for redress, or come to him complaining of the outrage which they will say has been perpetrated upon them, he will say, "I have not done it; Congress has done it; I never would have turned you out; I had no command that I wanted you to fill; the public service did not require you to be in the field; you have not been in the field; I never would have dismissed you; you are dismissed by the fiat of Congress, and not by the judgment or the conduct of the Executive."

With the honorable member, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and with all possible confidence in the President—all the confidence that a member of a coördinate department of the Government should have in another department of the Government—I hold him to his responsibility, believing that he will discharge it. If he shall fail to discharge it he will be called to that responsibility by the public judgment, and the public judgment will be pronounced in such terms that he will be obliged to listen to it. But I am not under the impression that he needs to be awakened to the discharge of his duty by any voice spoken either here or spoken by the people of the United States. If I were a member of the House of Representatives, and I believed that he knowingly kept in service major generals and brigadier generals who are wholly unfit for such commands, I should move his impeachment; and if he was brought before this body charged with an offense of that description, and he was convicted of that offense by the proof, we should be bound to pronounce but the one judgment, the judgment of guilty. But as long as he is the President of the United States, for one, however much I was opposed to his reelection, having been reelected, I give him the benefit of the presumption that he is willing to discharge his whole executive duty.

Mr. HOWE. I do not propose to prosecute this debate much further, but the last remark submitted by the Senator from Maryland suggests one reflection to my mind that I think proper to state. He says that if he were a member of the House of Representatives, and it was brought to his knowledge that the President had deliberately declined under the authority which Congress has conferred upon him to withdraw the commissions of officers whom he knew to be unfitted for the discharge of their duties, he should be prepared to move for the impeachment of the President.

He would regard it as a wanton neglect of official duty. The question occurs to my mind, if impeachment would be the just penalty of the President for refusing to discharge that duty which you say you have imposed upon him by a law which simply authorizes him to do it, what penalty ought to be imposed upon a Senator or a Representative who shall decline to discharge the very same duty, for the discharge of which they have the very same authority, or an authority higher than that? If it be an offense against the administration of public justice in the President to allow these men to hold their commissions and take their pay, is it not an offense against the administration of public justice in the Senator to allow these things to be done?

It is intimated here that this bill contains a reflection upon the President of the United States. How so, sir? It is simply doing the work ourselves which we have at one time said the President might do if he saw fit. If there be any reflection upon the character of the Commander-in-Chief, it is in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs which states specifically that there are officers holding high commissions and drawing high salaries, doing no duty, and not interfered with by the Commander-in-Chief. The reflection is in the report, not in the bill. The bill is plain matter of legislation, and reflects upon nobody. In point of fact, there is nothing in the report or in the bill which necessarily reflects upon the President of the United States; and I do not suppose anybody who had any hand in drawing either the bill or the report intended any such reflection.

There are two or three facts patent before us; nobody disputes them; to wit, we are paying a large amount of money every year for which we get no service whatever. It was said by the Senator from Indiana that after we had passed the bill the President might assign these men to duty within the three months. That is very true. Then, he says, nobody would be discharged. That is very true; but we would either get service or we would save money, one of the two. I do not insist upon anybody being mustered out of the service. If we can have them mustered into service, that will answer my purpose. But let us have the work or let us save the money. We do have the work. The trouble is the work is done by one class of men and the money goes to another class. I want those men to have the money who do the work.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask unanimous consent to make that motion.

Mr. WILSON and Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the motion cannot now be entertained.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know whether the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will accede to the request of the Senator from Maine, and withdraw his motion to indefinitely postpone the bill before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me we had better settle the matter now. We have a great many important questions which will soon be crowding upon us.

Mr. CONNESS. This is not in the way of any question.

Mr. GRIMES. If it is postponed now, we shall have to debate it all over again hereafter.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["Oh no!"]

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays upon that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am a little surprised that anybody should object when a Senator asks to have a bill go over which the objectors do not want to pass. I can understand why, when a member of the Senate is anxious to pass a bill, he should think a delay was injurious to its passage; but if this bill is never called up, it will do no harm. The object of the Senator is, not to pass the bill; the motion is to defeat it. I have said all that I design to say upon it; but it seems to me that if a Senator wants a bill to go over, where nobody wants to pass it, and will not urge action upon it, it is a very singular proceeding to urge the Senate to a vote to defeat the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the Senator the particular reason why I wish to have this matter settled now. I believe, and that we all have admitted, that there ought to be some action on this subject. I do not think this is the proper way. I think we should reject this bill for the reason that the power and responsibility are with the President, and he ought to exercise his power, and exercise it now. If this bill is pending along here for week after week, he may take no action about it, and look to Congress to settle this matter. I want it rejected, if we can reject it, if that is the sentiment of Congress, to defeat the bill, and let the President understand that the responsibility is upon him, and we look to him to do his duty.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Farwell, Harlan, Howe, Pomeroy, Trumbull, and Wade—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Hale, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—13.

So the bill was indefinitely postponed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, January 6, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TRANSFER OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of Congress of March 3, 1869, a statement exhibiting the various amounts transferred from and to appropriations during the year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FLORIDA TAX COMMISSIONERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a copy of the report of Hon. Austin Smith on the conduct of the tax commissioners for the district of Florida, &c.; which was, on motion of Mr. SLOAN, referred to the committee on the rebellious States.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to increase the pay of pensioners twenty-five per cent. from and after the 1st day of January, 1865; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

COLUMBIA AND SNAKE RIVERS.

Mr. WALLACE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to improve the Columbia and Snake rivers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 367, entitled "An act to repeal the provision of law requiring certain regents of the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute."

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, and was read a first and second time. It provides for the repeal of so much of the act to establish the Smithsonian Institution, for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men as requires that two of the regents of said Institution shall be members of the National Institute in the city of Washington.

Mr. COX. I may state that the object of this bill is to repeal that provision of law which requires that two of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution shall be members of the National Institute—an institution which is now obsolete.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing for a district and circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF TAX SYSTEM.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means consider and report, by joint resolution or otherwise, upon the expediency of providing for a commission, to consist of—members of the Senate and—members of the House, with leave to sit in vacation, to examine and report upon a system and details of taxation which shall bear equally upon the property and industry of the country, and shall best provide for maintaining the credit of the United States unimpaired, and yield a revenue adequate to the necessities of the Government; and whose duty it shall be to report by bill at the commencement of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED PRINTING PAPER.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, also introduced a joint resolution to promote the diffusion of knowledge in the United States by the suspension of duties on imported printing paper; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THANKS TO GENERAL SHERMAN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the joint resolution tendering thanks to Major General Sherman and his army.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee have directed me to report the joint resolution back with a substitute enlarging its scope so as to include the campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta.

The original resolution, which was read, provides that the thanks of the people and of the Congress of the United States are due and are hereby tendered to Major General William T. Sherman, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in their late brilliant expedition through Georgia; and that the President cause a copy of this joint resolution to be engrossed and forwarded to Major General Sherman.

The substitute provides that the thanks of the people and of the Congress of the United States are hereby tendered to Major General William T. Sherman, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in their late campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and the triumphal march thence through Georgia to Savannah, terminating in the capture and occupation of that city; and that the President cause a copy of this joint resolution to be engrossed and forwarded to General Sherman.

The substitute was agreed to; and the joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIRCUIT COURT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for another term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NEW STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, also submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on rules be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the rules of the House as to create two additional standing committees, namely, a Committee on Internal Revenue and a Committee on Banking and Currency; and that the committee further inquire into the expediency of converting the select committee on a Pacific railroad into a standing committee, and report the conclusions of the committee to the House at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. KASSON. I ask my colleague whether a resolution of the same character was not offered at the last session.

Mr. WILSON. This is more comprehensive in its character than any previous resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. Has the committee on rules leave to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. They have not, although it has been the usage to allow them to report at the convenience of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE ACT.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to submit a bill to amend an act to provide internal revenue for the support of the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, passed June 30, 1864, in order that it may be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. Where does the bill come from?

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means asked me to have it referred to them and ordered to be printed. We have not agreed to it. We have not had time to consider it. It has been carefully drawn, and that committee want it printed with the others that may be referred to them.

Mr. BROOKS. My object is not curiosity, but to know whether the bill has the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. There is no sanction except that they want the bill for investigation. I offer the bill on my own motion, and not as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and the bill was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 622, to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864, in order that they may be acted on at this time.

Mr. COBB. I object.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 363, to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up and read in extenso.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The bill has been considered by the members of that committee, and they unanimously concur in recommending it.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from New York states that the bill has been considered by that committee. If that be so, I have no desire to have it go to them again.

Mr. COBB. I would inquire of the Chair if this bill has been taken up by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It has been. The Chair looked at the gentleman from Wisconsin when unanimous consent was asked, supposing that he would object; but his back was turned toward the Chair, and he appeared to be engaged in conversation with a gentleman near him, and did not object.

Mr. COBB. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is in order to move a reference of the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make that motion.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 42, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER thereupon ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. DAVIS of New York.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 45.

So the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DELEGATE FROM MONTANA.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. I rise to a question of privilege. The Delegate-elect from the Territory of Montana, Mr. SAMUEL McLEAN, is present, and I ask that he may be sworn in.

Mr. McLEAN thereupon presented himself at the Speaker's desk and was duly qualified by taking the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and by the act of July 2, 1864.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the general pension appropriation bill returned from the Senate with an amendment, in order to act upon the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I object.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to call up this morning, pursuant to notice previously given, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution in reference to slavery was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman call it up for action to-day?

Mr. ASHLEY. No, sir; but for discussion, intending to allow that discussion to run on until the House sees fit to order the main question to be put.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, it requires a majority vote to set aside the consideration of private bills.

The consideration of private bills was set aside by a majority vote, and the motion to reconsider was taken up.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, "If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong." Thus simply and truthfully has spoken our worthy Chief Magistrate.

The proposition before us is, whether this universally acknowledged wrong shall be continued or abolished. Shall it receive the sanction of the American Congress by the rejection of this proposition, or shall it be condemned as an intolerable wrong by its adoption?

If slavery had never been known in the United States, and the proposition should be made in Congress to-day to authorize the people of the several States to enslave any portion of our own people or the people of any other country, it would be universally denounced as an infamous and criminal proposition, and its author would be execrated, and justly, by all right-thinking men, and held to be an enemy of the human race.

I do not believe such a proposition could secure a single vote in this House; and yet we all know that a number of gentlemen who could not be induced to enslave a single free man will nevertheless vote to keep millions of men in slavery, who are by nature and the laws of God as much entitled to their freedom as we are. I will not attempt to explain this strange inconsistency or make an argument to show its fallacy. I content myself with simply stating the fact.

It would seem as if no man favorable to peace, concord, and a restored Union could hesitate for a moment as to how he should vote on this proposition. Certainly, whatever of strife, sectional bitterness, and personal animosity these Halls have witnessed since my appearance in Congress, or, indeed, I may say, since the organization of parties in 1836, slavery has usually been the sole cause. No observer of our history, or of the political parties which have been organized and disbanded, now hesitates to declare that slavery is the cause of this terrible civil war. All who understand anything of our troubles, either in this country or Europe, now know that but for slavery there would have been no rebellion in this country to-day.

In the very nature of things it was impossible for a Government organized as ours to endure half slave and half free; and nothing can be clearer to the reader of history than that the men who made our Constitution never expected nor desired the nation to remain half slave and half free. Our fathers were men of ideas, and they believed that with the adoption of the Constitution slavery would cease to exist. Sir, while demanding liberty for themselves, and proclaiming to the world the inalienable right of all men to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, they were not guilty of the infamy of making a Constitution which, by any fair rules of construction, can be interpreted into a denial of liberty, happiness, and justice to an entire race.

That the founders of the Republic were sadly disappointed in their expectations that slavery would cease on the adoption of the national Constitution is undoubtedly true. Instead of disappearing as they confidently expected, circumstances unforeseen by them so strengthened slavery that in less than eighty years it became the dominant interest in the nation, and in 1860 openly demanded the entire control of the national Government. Because this demand was refused by the free laboring men of the North the slave-masters of the South organized this the most wicked of all rebellions, and for nearly four long years have waged this terrible war with the avowed purpose of destroying the best form of government ever vouchsafed to man, in order to establish in its stead a Government whose corner-stone should be human slavery. This is the logic of the contest. It has at last so fully developed itself that all the world, including its most stupid editors, now understand it. The Government of our fathers must either be maintained, and slavery die, or slavery must live and the Government be destroyed. The conflict is "irrepressible," and beyond compromise. The nation cannot longer endure half slave and half free.

Had statesmen administered this Government for the past thirty years instead of the trading politicians who have disgraced it, first by apologizing for, then justifying, and at last openly defending slavery as a right guaranteed by the national Constitution, we should have had no such desolating war as we have in this country to-day.

If the national Constitution had been rightfully interpreted, and the Government organized under it properly administered, slavery could not have legally existed in this country for a single hour, and practically but a few years after the adoption of the Constitution. Only because the fundamental principles of the Government have been persistently violated in its administration, and the Constitution grossly perverted by the courts, is it necessary to-day to pass the amendment now under consideration. I say this much in vindication of the memory of the great and good men who, when establishing this Government, made a Constitution which to-day is the best known among men.

As for myself, I do not believe any constitution can legalize the enslavement of men. I do not believe any Government, democratic or despotic, can rightfully make a single slave, and that which a Government cannot rightfully do it cannot rightfully or legally authorize or even permit its subject to do. I do not believe that there can be legally such a thing as property in man. A majority in a republic cannot rightfully enslave the minority, nor can the accumulated decrees of courts or the musty precedents of Governments make oppression just. I do not, however, wish to go into a discussion of the question of slavery as an abstract question. It is a system so at war with human nature, so revolting and brutal, and is withal so at variance with the precepts of Christianity and every idea of justice, so absolutely indefensible in itself, that I will not uncover its hideous blackness and thus harrow up my own and the feelings of others by a description of its disgusting horrors, or an attempted recital of its terrible barbarism and indescribable villainy.

It is enough for me to know that slavery has forced this terrible civil war upon us; a war which we could not have avoided, if we would, without an unconditional surrender to its degrading demands. It has thus attempted to strike a death-blow at the national life. It has shrouded the land in mourning and filled it with widows and orphans. It has publicly proclaimed itself the enemy of the Union and our unity as a free people. Its barbarities have no parallel in the world's history. The enormities committed by it upon our Union prisoners of war were never equaled in atrocity since the creation of man.

For more than thirty years past there is no crime known among men which it has not committed under the sanction of law. It has bound men and women in chains, and even the children of the slave-master, and sold them in the public shambles like beasts. Under the plea of Christianizing them it has enslaved, beaten, maimed, and robbed millions of men for whose salvation the Man of sorrows died. It so constituted its courts that the complaints and appeals of these people could not be heard by reason of the decision "that black men had no rights which white men were bound to respect." It has for many years defied the Government and trampled upon the national Constitution, by kidnapping, imprisoning, mobbing, and murdering white citizens of the United States guilty of no offense except protesting against its terrible crimes. It has silenced every free pulpit within its control, and debauched thousands which ought to have been independent. It has denied the masses of poor white children within its power the privilege of free schools, and made free speech and a free press impossible within its domain; while ignorance, poverty, and vice are almost universal wherever it dominates. Such is slavery, our mortal enemy, and these are but a tithe of its crimes. No nation could adopt a code of laws which would sanction such enormities, and live. No man deserves the name of statesman who would consent that such a monster should live in the Republic for a single hour.

Mr. Speaker, if slavery is wrong and criminal, as the great body of enlightened and Christian men admit, it is certainly our duty to abolish it, if we have the power. Have we the power? The fifth article of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1838 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

The question which first presents itself in examining this provision of the Constitution is, what constitutes two thirds of both Houses? or, what, in the eye of the Constitution, is two thirds of the House of Representatives? Is it two thirds of the entire number of members to which all the States, including the States in rebellion, would be entitled, if they were all now represented, or is it two thirds of the members who have been elected and qualified?

This question would have entered largely into the discussion of the subject now under consideration had not your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, decided, and this House sustained him in declaring, that a majority of the members elected and recognized by the House made a constitutional quorum.

It has, so far as the action of this body can dispose of the question, been authoritatively settled, and settled as I think it should have been, by declaring that a majority of the members elected and qualified constitutes a quorum, and that two thirds of a quorum can constitutionally pass this amendment. The question having been thus disposed of, I do not care to make an argument in support of a proposition thus authoritatively settled.

My colleague from the first district, [Mr. PENDELTON,] in a speech which he made at the last session against the passage of this amendment, raised the question as to the constitutional power of Congress to propose, and three fourths of the Legislatures of the States to adopt, an amendment of the character of the one now under consideration. He claimed that, though Congress passed the proposed amendment by the requisite two thirds, and three fourths of the Legislatures of the several States adopted it, or, indeed, all the States save one, it would not legally become a part of the national Constitution. These are his words:

"But neither three fourths of the States, nor all the States save one, can abolish slavery in that dissenting State, because it lies within the domain reserved entirely to each State for itself, and upon it the other States cannot enter."

Is this position defensible? If I read the Constitution aright and understand the force of language, the section which I have just quoted is today free from all limitations and conditions save two, one of which provides that the suffrage of the several States in the Senate shall be equal, and that no State shall lose this equality by any amendment of the Constitution without its consent; the other relates to taxation. These are the only conditions and limitations.

In my judgment, Congress may propose, and three fourths of the States may adopt, any amendment, republican in its character and consistent with the continued existence of the nation, save in the two particulars just named.

If they cannot, then is the clause of the Constitution just quoted a dead letter; the States sovereign, the Government a confederation, and the United States not a nation.

The extent to which this question of State rights and State sovereignty has aided this terrible rebellion and manacled and weakened the arm of the national Government can hardly be estimated. Certainly doctrines so at war with the fundamental principles of the Constitution could not be accepted and acted upon by any considerable number of our citizens without eventually culminating in rebellion and civil war.

This fatal heresy doubtless carried many men of character and culture into the rebellion who were sincerely attached to the Union. If we may credit the recently published private letters of General Lee, written in the spring of 1861, to his sister and friends, and never intended for publication, he was induced to unite his fortunes with the insurgents by the so-called secession of Virginia, under the belief that his first and highest allegiance was due to his State. Sir, I know how hard it is for loyal men to credit this. To thinking men nothing seems more absurd than the political heresy called States rights in the sense which makes each State sovereign and the national Government the mere agent and creature of the States. Why, sir, the unity of the people of the United States antedates the Revolution. The original thirteen colonies were never in fact disunited. The man who had the right of citizenship in Virginia had the same right in New York. As one people they declared their independence, and as one people, after a seven years' war, conquered it. But the unity and citizenship of the people existed before the Revolution, and before the national Constitution. In fact this unity gave birth to the Constitution. Without this unity and preëxisting nationality—if I may so express myself—the Constitution would never have been formed. The men who carried us through the revolutionary struggle never intended, when establishing this Government, to destroy that unity or lose their national citizenship. Least of all did they intend that we should become aliens to each other, and citizens of petty, independent, sovereign States. In order to make fruitful the blessings which they had promised themselves from independence, and to secure the unity and national citizenship for which they periled life, fortune, and honor, they made the national Constitution. They had tried a confederation. It did not secure them such a Union as they had fought for, and they determined to "form a more perfect Union." For this purpose they met in national convention, and formed a national Constitution. They then submitted it to the electors of the States for their adoption or rejection. They did not submit it to the States as States, nor to the governments of the several States, but to the citizens of the United States residing in all the States. This was the only way in which they could have submitted it and been consistent with the declaration made in the preamble, which says that "we, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution." The whole people were represented in this convention. Through their representatives they pledged each other that whenever the people of nine States should ratify and approve the Constitution submitted to them, it should be the Constitution of the nation.

In the light of these facts, to claim that our Government is a confederation and the States sovereign seems an absurdity too transparent for serious argument. Not only is the letter of the Constitution against such a doctrine, but history also. Since the adoption of the national Constitution twenty-two States have been admitted into the Union and clothed with part of the national sovereignty. The territory out of which twenty-one of these States were formed was the common territory of the nation. It had been acquired by cession, conquest, or purchase. The sovereignty of the national Government over it was undisputed. The people who settled upon it were citizens of the United States. These twenty-one States were organized by the concurrent action of the citizens of the United States and the national Government. Without the consent of Congress they would have remained Territories. What an absurdity, to claim that the citizens of the New England States, or of all the States, or of any section of the Union may settle upon the territory of the United States, form State governments, with barely inhabitants enough to secure one Representative in this House under the apportionment, secure admission as a State, and then assume to be sovereign and master of the national Government, with power to secede and unite with another and hostile Government at pleasure, and to treat all citizens of the United States as alien enemies who do not think it their duty to unite with them. This is the doctrine which deluded many men into this rebellion, and which seems to delude some men here with the idea that the national Constitution cannot be amended so as to abolish slavery, even if all the States in the Union demanded it save Delaware. Under this theory of State sovereignty, States like Florida and Arkansas, erected on the national domain, may, as soon as they secure admission into the Union, secede and embezzle all the property of the nation, including the public lands and forts and arsenals, declare all citizens of the United States who do not unite with them alien enemies, confiscate their property, rob them of their liberty, by impressing them into their army to fight against their own country and Government, and, if they refuse, to punish them by imprisonment and death. After doing this, if the authority to commit such wholesale robbery, impressments, and murders is denied them by the national Government they set up the claim that they are sovereign and independent, and are only defending their homes, their firesides and household gods, and we have men all over the North who to-day defend this monstrous assumption and villainy.

Mr. Speaker, I presume no man, not even my colleague, will deny that when the thirteen colonies or States assembled by their representatives in convention to make the present national Constitution they might have abolished slavery at once. Or, if the theory of the old parties is true, that a republican Government may authorize or permit the enslavement of men, which I deny, they could have provided for the emancipation of all slaves in twenty or fifty years, if they had seen fit; and if the people of nine States had voted to ratify such a constitution slavery could not, after the period named, have existed by State law and in defiance of the national Constitution, either in one of the old thirteen States or in any one of the States admitted into the Union since its adoption. If it was competent for the men who made the national Constitution to prohibit slavery at that time, or to provide for its future prohibition, why is it not just as competent for us now? The framers of the Constitution provided for its amendment in the section which I have already quoted. This was a wise provision. They provided that when an amendment was proposed and adopted in the manner and form prescribed it should become a part of the national Constitution, and be as valid and binding as though originally a part of that instrument.

Had the framers of the Constitution desired the protection and continuance of slavery they could easily have provided against an amendment of the character of the one now before us by guarding this interest as they did the right of the States to an equal representation in the Senate. They did not do it, because, as the history of the convention abundantly proves, the great majority of the framers of the Constitution desired the speedy abolition of slavery, and I contend that, so far from the Constitution prohibiting such an amendment, it has expressly provided for it.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a single section or clause in the national Constitution which clothes the political organizations which we call States with any of the attributes of a sovereign Power, but, on the other hand, prohibits in positive and unmistakable language any State from doing any act which a sovereign might do without the consent of Congress.

The supreme power of the national Government is rigorously maintained throughout the Constitution, and it is most emphatically ordained in article six, clause two, of the Constitution, as follows:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Section eight, article one, enumerates seventeen distinct sovereign powers of a national character conferred on Congress by the Constitution, and, as if to leave no doubt on the minds of any, this extraordinary enumeration of powers is followed by this sweeping and significant provision:

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

If I understand this provision correctly, it means that the framers of the Constitution intended that the national Government should be intrusted with the interpretation of the Constitution, not only as to the construction of the powers delegated by it to Congress, but to all departments of the national Government. They never intended that any State, or any number of States, nor the officials of State governments, should be competent in any capacity to judge of the infractions of the national Constitution by any department of the national Government, nor of the propriety of any law passed by Congress. Any citizen has the undoubted right to express his opinions, and criticize the action of the General Government or of any department thereof; but neither is a State nor are the officials of a State clothed with any authority to decide as to the constitutionality of any law passed by Congress, nor as to the propriety of any act done by any department of the national Government.

It is past comprehension how any man with the Constitution before him, and the history of the convention which formed that Constitution within his reach, together with the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court against the assumption of the State rights pretensions, can be found at this late day defending the State sovereignty dogmas, and claiming that the national constitution cannot be so amended as to prohibit slavery, even though all the States of the Union save one give it their approval.

That provision of the national Constitution which imposes upon Congress the duty of guaranteeing to the several States of the Union a republican form of government is one which impresses me as forcibly as any other with the idea of the utter indefensibility of the State sovereignty dogmas, and of the supreme power intended by the framers of the Constitution to be lodged in the national Government.

In this connection we ought not to overlook that provision of the Constitution which secures nationality of citizenship. The Constitution guarantees that the citizens of each State shall enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizens of the several States. It is a universal franchise which cannot be confined to States, but belongs to the citizens of the Republic. We are fighting to maintain this national franchise and prevent its passing under the control of a foreign Power, where this great privilege would be denied us or so changed as to destroy its value. The nationality of our citizenship makes our Army a unit, although from distant States, and makes them also invincible. It is objected that if we pass this proposition the requisite number of States cannot now be secured for its adoption. In answer to this objection I have to say that Congress has not, in submitting the proposed amendment, limited the time in which the States shall adopt it; nor has Congress attempted authoritatively to declare that it will require the ratification of twenty-seven States to adopt this amendment.

I hold that whenever three fourths of the States now represented in Congress give their consent to this proposition it will legally become a part of the national Constitution, unless other States, now without civil governments known to the Constitution, establish governments such as Congress shall recognize, and such States, together with any new States which may be admitted, shall be represented in Congress before three fourths of the States now represented adopt the proposed amendment; in which event the States thus recognized or admitted must be added to the number of States now represented in Congress, and the ratification of three fourths of the States thus recognized, and none others, is all that will be required to adopt this amendment.

I lay it down as a proposition which I do not believe can be successfully controverted, that neither the Constitution of the United States nor the constituted authorities under it can know of the existence of a State in this Union unless it has a civil government organized in subordination to and working in harmony with the national Constitution. This principle has been fully recognized by all the coordinate branches of the Government since the outbreak of the rebellion. In this House we have authoritatively declared that a majority of the members elected and qualified are a quorum competent to transact business. The Senate at this session have adopted this rule also. Two thirds of this quorum, then, if this decision be correct, as I believe it is, may constitutionally pass the proposition before us. If we may constitutionally pass this amendment by a vote of two thirds of a quorum of this House and Senate as now constituted, three fourths of the States now represented in Congress may constitutionally adopt it, provided they do so before any new States are admitted, or before a rebel State government is organized and recognized by the joint action of Congress and the Executive. I believe this is the true theory of the Constitution. Certainly it is the only theory consistent with national existence. If we adopt the theory that a State once a State is always a State we have no safety from factions and revolutions. Suppose that within the territorial jurisdiction known on the map of the United States as South Carolina there should be no civil government organized in the next fifty years such as Congress will recognize, do gentlemen claim that at the expiration of that time the old State organization would still be in existence, and that in order to secure the adoption of a constitutional amendment such a State ought to be included in the number from which the constitutional three fourths of the States must be secured for the ratification of an amendment? If not, then with what propriety can it be claimed as necessary to-day? The constitutional State government of South Carolina is as completely destroyed at this moment as though their Representatives had not been in these Halls, or their local government recognized by Congress for the past fifty years. Certainly no thoughtful man who has carefully examined this subject will defend the absurdity of the constitutional existence of political communities which we call States after their constitutional State governments have been destroyed by the action of their own citizens.

Speeches were made at the last session, and indeed at every session of Congress since the rebellion, to prove that the several acts of secession of the rebel States being illegal, were therefore void, and that the State constitutions in those States not only remained, but that the government of such States could at any time be put in motion without the consent of Congress, whenever ten or more loyal men could be found to assume the Governorship and a few of the subordinate offices therein. Loyal citizens of the rebel States are fast being cured of this fallacy. They have learned by experience that the Government of the United States is supreme, and that local governments in rebel States cannot be put in motion without the consent of Congress. The mass of men did not at first seem to recognize the fact that while acts of secession were illegal and void as affecting the rights of the national Government, its jurisdiction and sovereignty, nevertheless it was such a crime that those committing it forfeited all rights guaranteed them by the national Constitution under their State organization.

Mr. Speaker, can there be such a thing known to our national Constitution as a State without a constitutional government? In my opinion, sir, a State government, to be constitutional, must be organized and act in subordination to the national Constitution and in obedience to the laws of Congress. The national Constitution requires the officers in each State to swear to support it while discharging the duties of any State office to which they may have been elected or appointed. If a State does not act in subordination to the national Constitution, and its officers do not take an oath to support it, and they send no Senators or Representatives to Congress, there can be no constitutional State government in such State. Add to this the crime of secession, rebellion, and levying war, and the taking of an oath by the officers of such State to support another and a hostile government, and I claim it terminates of necessity, and of right ought to terminate, the existence of a constitutional government in every such State. In a constitutional point of view, if there is no loyal State government, such as I have described, but in its stead a government unknown to the Constitution established by the action of its citizens, then, in fact, there is no constitutional State government, and, of course, no State known to the Constitution. The States then in rebellion have no constitutional governments. They have civil organizations, however, hostile to the United States; organizations which are recognized as de facto rebel governments. When the rebellion is suppressed there will be no constitutional State governments, in fact, in one of the rebel States, and certainly the rebel de facto government cannot remain or be recognized by us after the rebellion is put down. The people residing within the limits of these so-called States will be under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, because in point of fact they cannot be subject to the laws of a State which has no State government known to the national Constitution.

I may be answered that it is the duty of Congress to guaranty to each State a republican form of government, and that this provision of the Constitution implies the continued existence of the State, although its government may have been overthrown by violence or by the deliberate acts of a majority of its citizens. Grant it, for the sake of the argument, but what will be the legal condition of such State if the minority do not call upon Congress to secure them a republican government? What will be its condition if Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power, attempts to secure such State a republican government and loyal citizens cannot be found in sufficient numbers to maintain a State government? Is not the condition of such State for the time being that of a quasi Territory? Certainly, during the time it remains in rebellion and is unable to maintain a State government it is not a State. If so, then, for practical purposes, whether of national administration or for the adoption of this amendment, States in rebellion and without civil governments which Congress can recognize, are not States within the meaning of the Constitution, and cannot act upon this amendment to the Constitution, or do any other act which a loyal State of the Union may lawfully do.

In pursuing this argument we must keep steadily in view the fact that the United States are not a confederation, but a nation; that the national Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and that the Government organized under it is clothed with the sovereignty of the whole people. The first and highest allegiance is due from the citizen to the national Government; he is also subject to the laws constitutionally enacted by his own local State government. If there be no local State government in existence the citizen is legally subject only to the laws of Congress. In the absence of a constitutional State government in any portion of the territory of the United States, where a State government formerly existed, Congress has all the authority of a State government within such territory. If, then, in the rebellious States there is no constitutional civil governments, are they States within the contemplation of the Constitution? I again ask the question, can there be such a thing known to our national Constitution as a State without a constitutional government? If not, then the rebel States, having no constitutionally organized civil governments, are not States within the meaning of the Constitution, and the territory and the citizens residing therein are subject to the jurisdiction of Congress the same as citizens in any Territory of the United States.

If the contrary theory is true, that a State once a State is always a State, nothing can be clearer to my mind than that the Constitution ought to be so amended at once as to make it impossible for a minority of the States to destroy the Government, as they might do every four years, if the Electoral College failed to elect a President and Vice President of the United States.

In the event of the Electoral College failing to elect, the duty devolves on the House of Representatives; each State having one vote. Two thirds of all the States must be present, and a majority of all the States is required to elect a President. The same rule applies when a Vice President is to be elected by the Senate. These are the words of the Constitution:

"But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two thirds of the States."

Now, suppose that from any cause two of the States represented here were not represented, and there were but twenty-three States represented in this House, and there had been no election in 1864 of a President by the Electoral College. The election for President in that event would have devolved on this House.

Would you, Mr. Speaker, have decided when the question was raised, as it would have been, "Is there a constitutional quorum present," that it required the presence of members in this House from two thirds of the States, including the eleven rebel States; or in other words, that twenty-four States must be represented here, and that it would require a majority of thirty-six States, or nineteen votes, to elect the President? If you would have so decided, and this House should have sustained that decision, and if but twenty-three States were present, there would have been an end of the Government. If we could not proceed to elect a President with the Representatives of twenty-three out of the twenty-five loyal States the Government would have fallen to pieces for the want of an Executive. If the duty of electing a President had devolved on this House at this session, and but twenty-three States were present, the question would not only have been raised as to what constituted a quorum, but the question also as to whether we should receive and count the electoral votes which, in the event of no election of President by the Electoral College, would probably have been sent here from several of the rebel States to embarrass, distract, and divide us. Sir, no loyal man can contemplate a contingency such as I have suggested without a shudder. If the theory that a State once a State is always a State is to obtain in the national administration, there is no safety or security for the Government. I do not know, sir, how you would have decided such a question if it had been raised under circumstances such as I have suggested; but I have faith to believe that you would have decided as I would have decided, that this House cannot know of the existence of a State in this Union which has not a civil government organized in subordination to and working in harmony with the national Constitution. Any other decision would have been fatal to our national existence. Let us not set a bad precedent now by declaring that it will require the ratification of twenty-seven States to secure the adoption of this constitutional amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I find ample authority in the Constitution for the national Government to protect itself against any action which a minority of the States might attempt by confederating against it. The Constitution clothes Congress with the power "to declare the punishment of treason." It clothes Congress with all power necessary to defend and preserve the Government which it created. "Levying war against the United States" is declared by the Constitution to be treason. A State which, by its constituted authorities, supported by a majority of its citizens, enters into any "treaty, alliance, or confederation," and makes war upon the national Government, commits the crime of treason, and it is competent for Congress to inflict any penalty it may deem expedient. I want the national Government to inflict punishment so terrible upon the authors of this rebellion that in all coming time there shall be no such rebellion again. I want no precedent established which shall pave the way for a minority of the States and a minority of the people to destroy this Government. I want the precedent established that the States and people remaining loyal to the Government, as distinguished from those who rebel against it, shall be clothed with the sovereignty of the Government. In this way only can we come out of this contest safely and "obtain indemnity for the past and security for the future."

But I have already detained the House much longer and said more on this point than I intended. I discussed this question at greater length at the last session, and experience has only confirmed me in the views then expressed. Gentlemen who have made speeches in this House, and editors who have charged me, and those agreeing with me on this question, with being practical disunionists and with recognizing the doctrines of secession, because holding that the lawful governments in the rebel States were destroyed by their acts of treason and rebellion, will not care probably after our experience to repeat such speeches and opinions, nor to have them republished to enlighten their readers or their constituents.

There is another consideration which ought not to be overlooked when weighing the practicability and expediency of this measure, and that is its financial aspect. Doubtless many gentlemen think this question has less connection with our finances and the credit of the country than any other before us. Not so. In my opinion, and I know I but utter the opinion of many practical business men, the passage of this amendment will give the Government a credit, both at home and abroad, which no victory of our arms, important and invaluable as many of them have been, has yet given us. Its passage will be a guarantee for peace, unity, stability, prosperity, power. It will be a pledge that the labor of the country shall hereafter be unfettered and free, and I need not say that under the inspiration of free labor the productions of the country will be tripled and quadrupled. It will be a pledge to the industrious German, and to all the free laboring men of Europe who are seeking homes among us, that they shall no longer be excluded, as they have been practically, from a country whose climate is softer and fertility greater than any on the continent.

I need not detain the House with an array of facts and figures to demonstrate the great advantage of free over slave labor. All thinking men have examined and comprehended the priceless value of free labor. Pass this amendment, and the free-laboring men of the North and of Europe will flock to the South, so that, in from three to five years, there will be four or five producing men in the rebel States where there was one before the rebellion; add to this vast number the four million emancipated slaves, and you have a free-labor force which, under the security thus given to capital and the inspiration thus given to labor, will make the land to blossom like the rose, and by their energy, enterprise, and power the free laboring men of the South will obliterate in a few years all trace of this terrible and desolating war, and make it a country which for prosperity and wealth shall acknowledge no superior, and a Government which for stability shall have no equal.

Suppose your Secretary of the Treasury goes into the market to-morrow to borrow $500,000,000, payable in thirty or forty years, what will be the first question asked by the capitalist? Will it be as to the rate of interest you are willing to give, or will it be rather as to your ability to pay the principal? I take it that that would be his first inquiry. He would ask you, "What will be the condition of your country and Government thirty or forty years hence?" If you could answer him, as you might truthfully answer him, were this amendment adopted, "Sir, in thirty or forty years we shall not be indebted at home or abroad a single dollar, and will be the most powerful and populous, the most enterprising and wealthy nation in the world;" if you could tell him this, and add, as you may, that in thirty or forty years we will show the world a Government whose sovereignty on the North American continent will not be questioned from ocean to ocean, and from the Isthmus of Panama to the ice-bound regions of the North; and tell him, also, that our system of free labor, guaranteed by the national Constitution to all generations of men, with free schools and colleges and a free press, with churches no longer fettered with the manacles of the slave-master, with manufactures and commerce exceeding in vastness anything which had ever been known, and a nation of men unrivaled in culture, enterprise, and wealth, and more devotedly attached to their country than the people of any other nation, because of the constitutional guarantee of the Government to protect the rights of all, and secure the liberty and equality of its people; if you could tell him this, and that such a race of free men would make the South and the entire nation what New England is to-day, your Secretary could have all the money he wanted, and on his own terms.

Mr. Speaker, what say the soldiers of the Union Army to the proposition before us? Shall not their voices be heard and their wishes be respected by their Representatives in the American Congress? Sir, there are no men in the Republic to whose wishes and judgment I would more willingly defer on this question than to the brave men who are periling life and all for country; to the men who have vanquished the enemy where ever they have met him, saved the nation, and by their heroism on the battle-field and their fidelity to principle at the ballot-box, made the passage of this amendment possible. Almost every letter I receive from the brave men who are in the Army from my district contains the anxious inquiry, "What of the constitutional amendment; will it pass?" And I doubt not that the same question has been asked by constituents at home and soldiers in the field of four fifths of the Representatives upon this floor. What shall be our official answer? Shall the glad news go forth to cheer alike the soldier and the citizen and the friends of this Government every where, that the expressly declared will of the people is to be respected and enacted into law; that on this great question there are no longer party divisions, but that practically the Representatives of the people are as united as they in demanding the passage of this constitutional amendment? If this shall be our answer, a shout will go up from our brave men in front of Richmond, at Savannah, and all along the Union lines and throughout the entire country, such as never before arose from the hearts and lips of men on the passage of any act by the American Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the year which has just closed has been a year of anxiety and also a year of joy. The ordeal through which as a nation we have passed has been a terrible one. I speak of the ordeal on the battle-field and at the ballot-box. We have presented to the world a sublime spectacle. We have tested our strength and know the constancy and courage of our men. Such disinterestedness, such heroism, and devotion to country, the world has never witnessed. Consecrated by a dispensation of fire and blood, the children of the Republic have grown to the full stature of manhood. Standing here in the nation's Council Halls, in the beginning of a new year, on the threshold of a new era, and in the presence of such events, let us comprehend the duty of true statesmen, and while legislating for the present, legislate also for the generations of men which are to succeed us. The eyes of the wise and good in all civilized nations are upon us. The men who embrace and defend the democratic idea in Europe are patiently and anxiously waiting to have us authoritatively proclaim to the world that liberty is the sign in which we conquer; that henceforth freedom is to be the animating principle of our Government and the life of our Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, while the Union soldier fights to vanquish the enemies of the Government, the duty of the true statesman is to provide that the enemy once vanquished shall never again be permitted for the same cause to reorganize and make war upon the nation. Pass this joint resolution submitting to the people for their ratification or rejection this proposed amendment to the national Constitution, and I am sure the nation will adopt it with shouts of acclamation, and when once adopted, you know, sir, and I know, and the enemies of this Government know, that we shall have peace, and that no such rebellion will ever be possible again. Pass this amendment and the gloomy shadow of slavery will never again darken the fair fame of our country or tarnish the glory of democratic institutions in the land of Washington. Pass this amendment and the brightest page in the history of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, now so soon to close, will be the one on which is recorded the names of the requisite number of members voting in its favor. Refuse to pass it, and the saddest page in the history of the Thirty-Eighth Congress will be the one on which is recorded its defeat. Sir, I feel as if no member of this House will ever live to witness an hour more memorable in our history than the one in which each for himself shall make a record on the question now before us. I implore gentlemen to forget party and remember that we are making a record, not only for ourselves individually, but for the nation and the cause of free government throughout the world. While members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress we cannot change the record which each must now make, and those who do not return to the next Congress can never reverse their votes of to-day, but must forever stand recorded, if voting against this amendment, among those voting to justify the rebellion and perpetuate its cause.

The genius of history with iron pen is waiting to record our verdict where it will remain forever for all the coming generations of men to approve or condemn. God grant that the verdict may be one over which the friends of liberty, impartial and universal in this country and Europe and in every land beneath the sun, may rejoice; a verdict which shall declare that America is free; a verdict which shall add another day of jubilee, and the brightest of all, to our national calendar. If this verdict is not given by the present Congress, I know, and you all know, it will be given by the next Congress; and that, too, with alacrity. The decree has gone forth; the people have pronounced it; and now is the golden hour in which we may all unite, if we will, and inaugurate a new era in our history. Let no man put forth his puny hand to stay the certain approach of the hour in which this act shall pass, or of the grand jubilee which shall follow its enactment into law. Let no member of this House attempt to postpone this great measure with the hope of being able to circumvent, by some petty scheme of compromise, the plainly written decree of Omnipotence. Let no loyal man, in such an hour as this, record his vote against this just proposition, and thus vote to prolong the rebellion and perpetuate the despotism of American slavery in this Republic.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, we are still grappling with treason and rebellion. Four years of war, desolating, destructive war, with all its attendant sacrifice of life, health, and treasure, have not yet sufficed to assure to us a permanent peace and an undivided nationality. That sublime spectacle, the simultaneous uprising of twenty millions of our people in behalf of duly constituted order and government, which was witnessed by the world after the affair at Fort Sumter, was an evidence of our love of civil liberty, of our veneration for the labors and services of the fathers of the Republic, and of our determination to protect and preserve republican institutions. How few, alas! if any, among us, could then penetrate the future and see the magnitude of the struggle in which we were about being involved; how few, indeed, before that time really comprehended or appreciated the blessings of free government, and the sacrifices we would, if necessary, make for its preservation.

This protracted struggle has brought us its lessons of experience, and if we are wise we will accept them, and profit by them, dearly bought as we know them to be. But if we emerge from this terrible conflict, as I firmly believe we shall, a better people, with our Government thoroughly tested and purified, with our resources only more fully developed instead of exhausted, with a purer and better republicanism, and with the true spirit of liberty pervading our people and our institutions, these glorious results will be worth all and more than their cost.

With a population devoted to the arts of peace, with an empty Treasury, without an Army or a Navy worthy the name, we accepted the dread alternative of war, and for four years, with sublime, heroic devotion, our young men have marched to battle and to death, sustained by the loyal men and women at home, with an energy that never flagged, and a firm resolve that never hesitated. Defeat and disaster from time to time seemed but to swell the nation's heart, and nerve the nation's arm to deeds of nobler daring. Great losses called for greater sacrifices, and the call was met with a cheerful response, until defeat and disaster are now beginning to turn to decisive victory.

In the midst of this struggle, when all our thoughts were turned upon the conflict, and every energy taxed to support the Government in its vast endeavor to save the nation's life, the time fixed by law for the selection of a President and other officers of the Government, State and national, arrived and demanded the people's attention.

This was regarded by the wisest among us as the most critical period in our history. The question was frequently asked and freely canvassed, can our Government, which had demonstrated its power in times of peace and of foreign war, withstand the shock of an exciting popular election in the midst of civil war and rebellion? The duty could not be evaded. The contest came, and the friends of the Government had to meet at the bar of public opinion their political opponents, many of whom sympathized openly with the enemy, while others criticised and condemned almost every act of the Administration. Calmly, quietly, deliberately, as became a great people engaged in the solution of momentous problems, the American voters exercised their right of suffrage, and thus exhibited to the world a spectacle of unsurpassed grandeur, without a parallel in history, and beyond the power of achievement by any nation on the face of the globe. With majorities unprecedented, they declared to the world, on the 8th day of November, 1864, that we are a nation, and are willing and able to defend our nationality. Here is a record by which the traitor may learn his doom; a record from which the sympathizer can derive no comfort; a record to confirm the doubtful, to fix the wavering, and cheer the patriot; and a record which will afford profitable reading to the intermeddling nations of Europe. In the broad sunlight of that glorious record let us read our duty and our destiny. At whatever cost, at whatever sacrifice, under every imaginable state of circumstances, whether its consummation be near at hand or afar off, we must subdue the rebellion. We owe this to ourselves, to the institutions committed to our care, to those who shall hereafter occupy the land we now occupy, to the memory of our revolutionary ancestors, to the sacred cause of religion and religious liberty, to the civilized world, and to the devotee of freedom in whatever clime or country he may be found.

This war is not of our seeking; its cause, if it be not utterly causeless, is not chargeable to us. We have at all times exhibited a ready acquiescence in the requirements of our national bond. We invaded no rights, we withheld no remedy; but time and again, and again, at the sacrifice of self-respect and of manhood, we have yielded to the behests of the slave power. It was not until treason had reared its armed crest; not until treason had insulted our emblem of nationality; not until treason boldly attacked our national existence, that we took up arms in self-defense; and, having taken up those arms, let them not be grounded until traitors shall submit to constituted authority, and be thoroughly subjugated and properly punished. We entered upon this national defense totally unprepared in every department of the Government, so thoroughly had treason diffused itself and almost completed our destruction before the administration of public affairs passed from traitors and imbeciles into the hands of honest and loyal men. But among the people there was that patriotism, that devotion to liberty, which supplied every deficiency, which freely poured its wealth into the national coffers, built a navy that commands the respect of the world, and organized an army whose prowess will subdue the rebellion, and whose heavy tramp shall yet shake the civilized earth. Four years of exhaustive war upon a scale of grandeur unknown in modern or ancient times, with all its burdens, instead of enervating or unnerving our people, has but served to demonstrate our strength, our resources in men and money, and (what is far better) our exhaustless patriotism, and proved to the world our complete ability to sustain the Government, to suppress the rebellion, to gather up, and reconstruct its shattered portions, to remove the cause of all these troubles, and to settle with other nations whatever accounts may require adjustment.

The people fully understand and appreciate the position of public affairs; they are not silent or disinterested spectators of the hurried scenes that crowd the hour, and are fully equal to every emergency as it arises. Let no man distrust their honesty, their intelligence, or their patriotism. They are daily and hourly, and with alacrity, performing every duty which the national peril imposes, and they are expecting of us, as their Representatives, a like performance of our duty.

Liberated as the public legislator now is of mere party harness and party machinery, let him strip off these unworthy garbs, gird on the mantle of public duty, and see that every manly effort is put forth to carry out the unmistakable voice of our people. To effect the complete restoration of law and order, that being the primal object of the war on our part, we should not hesitate to strike blows wherever they shall be most effectual, and to remove every obstacle which lies in the pathway of complete success. The Union of these States under the forms of republican government, molded in the spirit of liberty, is to our people more precious than any other earthly interest, and to preserve it all other interests must yield.

In my humble opinion we cannot hope for complete success until slavery, the universally acknowledged cause of rebellion, shall be extinguished, and both monsters buried in a common grave.

Slavery is dying; it raised its arm to destroy this Government, and the American people have decreed that it is unfit to live. The course of events for the last four years has shown conclusively that there is no panacea to relieve the patient; the skill of its ablest defenders cannot long shield it from its inevitable doom. No act of ours is necessary to accomplish this result, but while we are witnessing its death agony let us take care to provide by amendment of the Constitution that under no circumstances hereafter shall slavery exist in any of these States.

The bill now under consideration proposes to submit the following amendment of the Constitution to the several States for adoption or rejection, according to the terms prescribed by that instrument, and if ratified by the votes of three fourths of the States will then become a part of our fundamental law:

ARTICLE XIII.

SEC. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The effect of such amendment will be to prohibit slavery in these United States, and be a practical application of that self-evident truth, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

This bill originated in the Senate during the last session of Congress, in obedience to what was believed to be the general sentiment of the American people, and passed by the necessary vote of two thirds of the members of that body. It was then sent to this House for concurrence, and after considerable discussion was defeated by a vote of 95 in the affirmative and 66 in the negative, (twenty-one members not voting,) being twelve votes less than necessary to make the two-thirds vote required by the Constitution. The question now before us arises upon a motion to reconsider such vote, action upon which was continued from the last to the present session of Congress.

Probably it was right that the question of reconsideration should thus have been postponed. During the last session of Congress we were just entering upon an exciting political canvass; this very question of slavery, its further continuance or its utter destruction, entered largely into the issues and discussions of that canvass; and in a Government like ours, resting upon the will of the people, and deriving its "just powers from the consent of the governed," it was well to have another and more definite expression of the public will. We passed through that canvass; nearly every one of us on this floor went directly before our own people with our respective records of the last session accompanying us, and the result of that canvass is now a part of our nation's history. No man can question or gainsay the popular verdict; it has been expressed in unmistakable language, and he who is willing to bow to the voice of those whom for the time being he represents in this Hall, cannot doubt the action which the people now expect at his hands.

Congress cannot amend the Constitution, and hence, if this bill should pass, the question will then simply be referred to the people of the several States for their action. In other words, we, by our action here, simply authorize the people to determine for themselves whether they will ratify or reject the proposed amendment. To me it seems that on such a proposition there should not be a dissenting voice. Whatever questions may otherwise divide us, we all assent to the proposition that our people are capable of self-government, and have the right to alter their laws, fundamental as well as statutory.

Is slavery, then, too sacred to be submitted to the ordeal and judgment of our people? What is this institution of American slavery? A system of fraud, of injustice, of crime, and of tyranny. In the comprehensive language of an eminent divine, it is the "sum of all villainies." It tramples upon every moral precept, sets at defiance every divine law, and destroys every natural right of man. Like the poisonous opus, it diffuses its deadly malaria, and slave and master alike become its victims. It has debased the social circle, polluted the sanctuary, defiled the judicial ermine, and corrupted every department of the Government. It was the evil genius which troubled the fathers in their labors of patriotism, and produced dissension where concord alone should have reigned. Like the old serpent, it entered our Garden of Eden and seduced from their loyalty many of the sons and daughters of the Republic. Winding its deadly folds around the goddess of Liberty, it claimed and exercised despotic power in the very sanctum sanctorum of her temples. It laid its hand upon our nervous system and the nation became palsied. For eighty years it has been the deadly enemy of republican institutions; for eighty years it has molded the legislation of the country; for eighty years it has controlled the foreign policy of the Government; for eighty years it has crippled the power and energies of an otherwise free people; for eighty years it has ruled the executive and influenced the judicial departments; for eighty years it has commanded the Army and the Navy; for eighty years it has muzzled free speech and free press; for eighty years it has poisoned public opinion and repressed every aspiration of freedom; for eighty years it has made the American name a hissing and a by-word among the nations of the earth; for eighty years it robbed the American people of their rights under the Constitution; for eighty years it has ruthlessly trampled upon every principle of the Declaration of Independence; for the last four years it has waged a fiendish, malignant, remorseless war against us, striking with death the first-born in almost every loyal household, bringing untold misery upon the nation, demanding from our people sacrifices of blood and treasure to an extent that might well appall and crush the spirit of any other people on earth; and yet with this glaring and damnable record against this institution, we have gentlemen within this hall of freedom, sitting beneath the folds of that thrice glorious flag of liberty, Representatives of a free people, who hesitate to strike this last blow which shall exterminate the monster forever and ever.

This Congress may not heed the public voice; it may refuse to respond to the known sentiment of our constituents; but before the close of this year, so recently ushered into existence, another Congress, fresh from the people, will obey their voice, and secure to themselves, by such act, an honorable fame, and be remembered with gratitude by untold millions who are hereafter to enjoy its blessings.

Another and also a very important question is rapidly pressing upon us for solution. As our conquering armies move from State to State, subduing the rebellion and preparing the way for the resumption of civil authority, we shall continue to have, as we now have, applications from these States for recognition, or, if I may use the term, for readmission. I do not for a moment believe in either of the positions assumed by the respective friends of each, that secession can take any State out of the Union, or that any State by such act has destroyed itself, committed suicide, as it is said, or that the rebellious district is to be considered and treated as foreign territory. In dealing with this question of recognition, we must exercise that caution and circumspection which its magnitude demands. "Each House" of Congress "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and hence no man claiming to represent any State can have a seat on this floor until these several facts shall have been adjudicated by this House. Here we obtain a potential voice in the question of reconstruction, and while it is desirable that civil government shall supersede military authority as speedily as possible, let us not in our anxiety mistake the rising of the sun for its meridian splendor.

Torn, convulsed, and shattered as the social and civil systems of the rebellious district must necessarily be, it is unreasonable to expect that its people will be capable, upon the dispersion of the rebel armies in their respective States, of immediately exercising civil functions and authority. Society has almost been resolved into its original elements; vestiges of lurking treason will remain, and the bad passions engendered by the strife must be suffered to subside before reason will be fully able to resume its sway. While we remember that it is the constitutional duty of the United States to "guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," let us not forget that the surest and safest way to discharge this duty is to provide proper guards and checks for the protection of individual and social rights in these communities; to keep over them, so long as may be necessary, a guardian watch and care; to remove every opposing element; "to bind up the broken reeds;" to infuse a love of country and of devotion to the Constitution and laws of the land; and last, but not least, to see that the name and spirit of human bondage shall be crased from every State constitution, and personal freedom without distinction assured to every one of their citizens.

When these things shall have been accomplished, and society reconstructed upon this improved basis, with every germ of aristocracy uprooted, we shall then be prepared to perform the constitutional injunction, readmit these "wayward sisters" to the family circle, and establish within the borders of each, in truth and in fact, a republican form of government.

Some good people, in connection with this matter, are giving themselves, in my opinion, much unnecessary uneasiness about the question, "What shall we do for or with the freedmen?" May we not with equal propriety ask, "What shall we do for or with the late owners of these freedmen?" The one is as important as the other, and both may well claim the consideration of the statesman and the philanthropist. Both classes have been and are being liberated from the thralldom of slavery, and their new condition presents many interesting phases. The war, however, in its varying changes, is daily relieving both questions of many of their supposed complications, and probably the wisest course to pursue is to hasten the day when the system which has debased the one and enfeebled the other shall cease to exist; to leave both classes in the hands of God who created them, and giving to each equal protection under the law, bid them go forth with the scriptural injunction, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

But, Mr. Speaker, our duty as a people will not end with the suppression of the rebellion, the extinction of the evil which caused it, and the restoration of the Constitution and laws over the entire extent of our national domain. We have accounts to settle with other nations who, during this long struggle for nationality, have thrown many obstacles in our way, and given to our adversaries every moral and material assistance in their power without actually, eo nomine, becoming their allies. The aristocracies of Europe have long viewed with alarm the successful rise and progress of democratic ideas of government on this continent, and sought for a favorable opportunity to crush them out of existence. The success of our system, based upon the doctrine of man's capacity and natural right for self-government, they easily foresaw must ultimately and inevitably lead to a conflict on their own soil; for ideas and principles so entirely antagonistic will sooner or later produce reflection, discussion, decision, the final result of which probably would be the entire change of their governmental systems. Hence, upon the breaking forth of armed rebellion among us, they seized upon the fact with avidity as the auspicious moment so long desired, and with indecent haste acknowledged our bands of traitors to be a "belligerent Power," and entitled to "belligerent rights."

In view of my responsibility as a member of this House and a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which are referred the important and delicate relations between this and other nations, I desire to declare calmly and dispassionately that the conduct of France and England throughout our troubles has been, and yet is, of such a character as to call, at an early day, for full and thorough investigation and full and thorough settlement and adjustment. We have seen and felt their aid to our adversaries; through their connivance the rebel soldier has been armed and clothed and fitted for his assaults upon our nationality; in their harbors and upon their waters, almost unmolested, have rebels fitted out their piratical crafts, sailing under their colors; armed with their guns, manned by their subjects, but commanded by rebels, have these vessels been sent upon the ocean to prey upon our commerce and to destroy it. And here they have been but too successful. That commerce which, four short years ago, whitened every sea and visited every harbor, is now utterly destroyed, and scarce an American merchantman now unfurls the American flag.

The right of asylum has been freely granted to rebel pirates; and these freebooters, whom the civilized world has long since held as "enemies of mankind," are received with open arms, nurtured, caressed, encouraged, and strengthened for their work of destruction.

British subjects and British vessels, in defiance of the queen's proclamation, but without an attempt at punishment by British officials, are constantly engaged in contraband trade with the rebels, violating our blockade, which is recognized by that Government but suffered to be violated with impunity by its subjects.

Public fairs are held in Great Britain, under the leadership of her aristocracy, aided by southern snobbery, for the avowed purpose of raising money for the rebel cause, and but a few days since, under the thin guise of philanthropy, a British lord—Lord Wharncliffe—had the impudence to ask permission of our Government to remit British gold to rebel prisoners in our hands, while not a word of sympathy is heard; or a morsel of comfort offered, in behalf of the thousands of our brave soldiers who are languishing in southern prisons, denied the absolute necessities of life, and treated with an inhumanity and barbarity that would disgrace the most degraded heathen nation on earth.

American rebels and their Canadian confederates have for months past been arming and preparing for armed invasion of our northern border, have lately crossed that border, seized American vessels on the lakes, invaded our soil, and robbed and murdered our citizens.

President Monroe, in his seventh annual message to Congress, in speaking of the Governments on this and the European continent, uses this emphatic language:

"In the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more intimately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety."

This enunciation, made more than forty years ago, with the general concurrence of our people, and acquiesced in by the world for that length of time, has become the settled, firm, fixed policy of this Government. When made it was regarded as eminently wise and proper, and forty years of experience has but strengthened and confirmed the views thus entertained. While we have diligently maintained a strict neutrality in all the affairs of Europe, abstaining from "entangling alliances," we have ever regarded it our duty to vindicate on this continent a similar neutrality on the part of the Governments of Europe. So long as the United States lived together in peace, devoted to the noble work of building up a great Republic, we feared no insidious foreign intervention, and dreaded no danger. But on the first outbreak of hostilities Europe thought her hour had come, when our troubles at home would place it out of our power to vindicate our policy and our dignity.

Napoleon III, seized with the Quixotic idea that it was his mission on earth to be the chosen protector of the Latin races, with all their bigotry and superstition, and to extend them wheresoever the French eagle would enable him to accomplish his desires, introduced French intrigue, French diplomacy, French arms into the neighboring republic of Mexico for the purpose of subverting her Government, destroying the rights of her people, and inaugurating on this continent a political system antagonistic to our own, and which should sooner or later threaten to destroy our peace or endanger our safety.

He has partially succeeded in his designs, and we are now witnessing (with varied success) the efforts of a free people engaged in the heroic attempt of saving themselves and their country from subjugation by an "imported emperor," sustained and assisted by the power of the French army and navy.

But for our domestic troubles these audacious efforts to crush a sister republic, and to build up monarchical institutions upon her ruins, would never have been undertaken, and in the first glimmering of success to our arms the minds of our people are instinctively turned to Mexico, with a firm resolve that we cannot now or at any time hereafter consent to any "attempt on the part" of Europe "to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere," and among the first of our duties growing out of this rebellion will be to declare, and to enforce the declaration, that Maximilian is but a temporary emperor, and that the people of Mexico are entitled to and shall have republican institutions, and if need be she shall have these institutions, with the consent of her people, under the folds of our flag and under the protection of our Constitution.

Looking at these multiplied and increasing instances of foreign intervention in our affairs, we may well ask the question, can indignity and outrage go any further? And shall there not be a day of reckoning? Shall we longer submit to these humiliations and indignities without a murmur or word of complaint? God forbid! A man who does not vindicate his own self-respect is unworthy the respect of his associates; and precisely so with a nation. The primal duty of a nation is to vindicate its dignity and to suffer no wrong at the hands of any of its neighbors; for "nature has established a perfect equality of rights among independent nations, and none can naturally lay any claim to superior prerogative."

Will it be said that in the midst of our present troubles we are too weak to assert our rights, or too effeminate to maintain them? Sir, let me say to this House that we are not strong enough much longer to refuse a vindication of our national honor. We cannot afford to exist (if we were craven enough to desire it) by the sympathy or forbearance of any other Power, and I trust we shall never be prepared, whatever fate may have in reserve for us, to solicit the protection of any other Government. While we exist as a nation let us maintain our national rights and defend our national dignity, and if in so noble a struggle we must fail; if in the exercise of this God-given right we must go down, let us at least secure for ourselves the memory of an honorable name, and leave to history an example worthy of imitation.

But, sir, we shall not fail. Let us in all our transactions be just, and fear not. Let us faithfully discharge these and other duties as they arise, and it needs not the spirit of prophecy to foretell what, under the providence of God, is to be our nation's destiny.

"There is light beyond—
And dove-like peace with gentle wing descends;
See, as she comes, the hideous bird of death
Flaps his dark plumage, shrieking as he flies
From fields whereon he looked for future prey.

"Brethren, united as in former days,
Consult together for the common weal;
Chastened in spirit, more forbearing they,
Loving God better for their punishment—
Columbia's genius, smiling, looks abroad,
And cries, exultant, ALL, AT LAST, IS SAFE."

This war is shaking North and South, East and West, to their centers, and the influences that will be fully developed in years to come are to us now scarcely perceptible. Antiquated ideas are being laid aside, and mental vigor no longer pursues the ancient channels. Theories and principles which heretofore received our homage for no better reason than that they had received the homage of our fathers, are wasting away beneath the touch of new thought and a new experience. The sordid are becoming liberal, the selfish profuse, the brave heroic. Age is rejuvenated, and youth and manhood possess increased vitality and energy, while the "old fog" has become an antique relic, and lives only in the unforgotten past. The immense demands of our struggle are bringing our people up to the requisite standard. They are proving themselves equal to the occasion, and exemplifying their capacity in every sphere in which they are called to act. The nation is being born again, and from the fire and smoke of battle, from its death groans of agony, from the patient suffering in the hospital, from the victorious shout of the conqueror, from every avenue of industry, quickened into new life, the American Republic will emerge wiser, better, purer, and more powerful. We are called upon to carry up higher and higher the work of the fathers. We are to develop, to mature, to protect every energy, every sentiment, every aspiration in man's nature, to secure to him every natural right, to demonstrate to the world his capacity for civil, social, religious, mental, and physical enjoyment. Our Government, based upon these principles, and sustained for their preservation, is to be a guide for the nations, and to stand in every noble attribute toward them as the Alps stand toward their surrounding hills. With our immense population, its rapid augmentation, its peculiar characteristics, having in its veins the blood of all other nationalities—with our climates, soils, productions, mineral wealth, who is there to say to us "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed?" We are planted on the North American continent, and the three oceans and the Gulf can alone limit our territorial expansion. The lines which you now see on the map of North America as dividing one national possession from another will disappear, they will be sponged out by our people, and our children will see, if we do not live to see, the American flag floating over every foot of this continent, and the American Constitution protecting every human being on its soil.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make some observations in reply to the very remarkable criticism pronounced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] on the anti-slavery portion of the President's message.

If the war should end now without a division of the Union, what would be the status of slavery? It has been abolished in Maryland by the new constitution; but it is said that the soldiers had no right to vote, and without their votes the constitution was not adopted. West Virginia has provided for gradual emancipation; but that State, it is alleged, has no legal existence, and therefore its action is null and void. In the State of Virginia a new constitution prohibiting slavery has been adopted by the loyal people within the Union lines; but the constitutionality of this action has been much questioned, even by anti-slavery men. Missouri has partially abolished slavery, and the convention, soon to assemble there, it is supposed, will dispose of what is left. In Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana, slavery has been prohibited by conventions representing the Union people of those States; but it is said that these conventions were irregularly called, and their action is therefore void. In Kentucky such slaves as enter the United States Army are freed by act of Congress; but it is alleged that the act is unconstitutional. Congress has abolished slavery in the District of Columbia, and prohibited it in all the Territories; but it is said the first act is void, without the assent of Maryland and Virginia, and the latter is in conflict with the dictum of the Supreme Court in the case of Dred Scott. In all the remainder of the States the slaves were liberated by the President's proclamation; but that, instrument, it is said, is too just to be legal. Under these several enactments, however, the slaves, without waiting to test their validity, are leaving their old masters, forming new associations, seeking education, earning new homes, learning self-reliance, and thus erecting barriers to the revival of slavery stronger than legislation itself.

It is apparent from this statement that if the confederacy should suddenly collapse, liberating our Union fellow-citizens that are believed to exist in large numbers within its picket lines, we would still have the slavery question, out of which the whole trouble grew, to be settled and disposed of. It ought to be equally apparent to all observing persons that there is but one way to end the strife. Slavery in the end must die. It has cost the country too much suffering and too much patriotic blood, and is in theory an institution too monstrous, to be permitted to live. The only question is, shall it die now, by a constitutional amendment—a single stroke of the ax—or shall it linger in party warfare through a quarter or half a century of acrimonious debate, patchwork legislation, and conflicting adjudication? The people were consulted upon this question last fall, and they have responded in favor of emancipation. I respect their opinion, not because I am a politician, the motive hinted at in the message, but because experience has taught me to rely upon the judgment of the unambitious classes. I am reminded that there was a large minority. True, but the suffering consequent upon this terrible war, and not love of slavery, made the minority so large. The people suffered from the draft, from taxation, and from a depreciated currency, and untruthful men told them that their own Government imposed these hardships, not from the necessities created by the rebellion, but from mere love of despotic cruelty. Consult your Democratic constituency and you will find they are not so much infatuated with slavery as many suppose. I think I would not misrepresent the largest portion of the Democrats in my own district if I say that however much they may have condemned anti-slavery agitation prior to the rebellion, they would now be glad to have the institution buried out of their sight forever. Two classes alone would object: those who are so poorly endowed as to be jealous of negro competition, and those who, being more happily born, apprehend that their pride and importance might in some way be compromised if the distance between themselves and any portion of the laboring classes were lessened.

The President, in obedience to the advice of the people and the dictates of his own kind heart and unimpassioned judgment, has recommended that we should submit this amendment to the action of the States. Why should it not be done?

Because, says the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] we should not amend the Constitution in the midst of civil war. Why, then, did he, in the close of his speech, propose to amend it through the medium of a convention, so as to give slavery an increased representation in this House and a protraction of its mischievous life, and, further, to amend, in pursuit of some State sovereignty vagary, so as to sink the Government of the United States into a mere agency for the collection of customs? Do not take the medicine now, says the tender nurse to the sick man, wait till you are well and able to bear it. If the gentleman will examine his own heart he will probably find that it is the character of the amendment that is offensive to him, and not its untimely presentation.

Again, says the gentleman, some of the States are not represented here. He seems to forget that Congress does not make amendments to the Constitution, but only proposes them. They must be accepted by three fourths of all the States in the Union before they become part of the fundamental law. If Congress cannot even propose amendments before the seceded States come in, how can the gentleman call his convention? for that must be done by Congress. If these States are not represented here the fault is theirs, not ours. Must all legislation be stayed until they choose to return? and if not, why this more than other important acts? If that rule should be adopted we would always be in the power of a few members who chose to place themselves beyond the reach of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The gentleman trifles with the gravity of the question and the good sense of the House when he raises these objections, but still proposes to waive them in favor of a convention to consider his own amendments.

Why not tolerate slavery, continues the honorable gentleman, and thus make the slaveholders contented with the Union? What evidence is there that toleration would content them? They separated from the Union, and organized an independent government in February, 1861. When, prior to that, had the institution for whose prolonged cruelty the gentleman pleads so earnestly lacked toleration? I submit that it had always been tolerated; nay, more, it had always had its will and its way in this Republic—I trust I will not offend any member's sensibilities if I say its oppressive will and its unchristian way. Whatever was asked was granted. When it asked new markets to raise the price of men and women, and to create a demand for the surplus children of the institution, the request was granted. Louisiana and Florida Territories were purchased in part for this purpose. For this purpose Texas was smuggled into the Union, and a war unnecessary for any other purpose secured the northern provinces of Mexico. When it demanded that white laborers should go further north, and surrender mild-climated Missouri to slave labor, the surrender was made. When from motives of policy it demanded the passage of the Missouri compromise, it was passed. When it demanded its repeal, it was repealed. It bade us vote down the Wilmot proviso, and we obeyed. It demanded that escaped bondmen should be caught and returned, free of cost, and we gave them the despotic law. Again it demanded exemption from the criticism to which all things else in a republic are exposed, and we granted the immunity. To this end we submitted to a censorship of the mails, and authorized the burning of all offensive papers and letters, in the vain hope to destroy eternal ideas. To this end it demanded silence in this House and in the Senate, and we adopted the "Atherton gag." To this end it demanded silence in the North, and every city raised its pro-slavery mob to demolish presses and murder editors and lecturers. The hand of slavery has ever been against everybody, giving the Republic no rest day nor night. All day long these Halls and the country resounded with its insolent demands. Now the West must be Africanized, now the East must be crushed, now Cuba must be stolen, and now Africa unbarred to the pirates, and it woke us up at night with its fierce clamors for escaped negroes. No, sir, slavery rebelled not because it was not tolerated, but because it would not tolerate anything else; I may say because it could not afford to tolerate anything else. It would not tolerate the Declaration of Independence, because that instrument proclaimed the freedom and equality of the human race. It would not tolerate the literature of the English language, nor the Christianity of the American churches, nor the civilization of the nineteenth century, because their spirit was opposed to human bondage. It could not tolerate New England, because her education, her industry, her sobriety, her justice, and her unboasting courage was an implied censure upon slavery. And last of all, slavery refused to tolerate the great principle upon which this Republic is founded—upon which all republics must be founded; the will of the majority constitutionally expressed. It was not only intolerant, but belligerent. It could not be otherwise. It recognized a natural though undeclared foe in every good cause, word, and work, and in its efforts to destroy these has destroyed itself. Conscious of its own inherent wrong it began its defense before it was assailed, and, like the glass fortress, it has fallen not by the assaults of its enemies, but by the concussion of

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 10.

its own guns. It is pierced by its own poisoned arrow.

"So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
Viewed his own feathers on the fatal dart,
And winged the shaft that quivered in his heart."

We can hardly claim the honor of aiding even in its taking off. Like Falstaff's victim, it was quite dead before we dared to strike. But tolerate it, cries the gentleman, and pacify the madmen of the South. If New York were afflicted with hydrophobia, the gentleman would advise his constituents to tolerate mad dogs. Do not muzzle them, he would tenderly exclaim, do not chain them, do not kill them, but tolerate, conciliate, cherish them until this terrible disease disappears from the city. But if slavery is prohibited the country will become homogeneous, and, in his opinion, homogeneity is not desirable. Neither the ancient nor modern nations of Europe, he informs us, were homogeneous. They had many systems of worship, and many kinds of languages and races of men; but unfortunately for his argument, in another part of his speech, and for a different purpose, he confesses that these same nations were afflicted with long and frequent civil wars originating in that lack of homogeneity which he so much commends. But if this diversity of character is as desirable as represented, certainly we have enough of it without trying to reinstate slavery. Religion is nowhere more free than in this country. Every man selects his own altar. And as for races and languages, what quarter of the many-tongued earth has not contributed to our population? No thanks, however, to the honorable gentleman for this. As the leader and organ editor of the American party, he could not tolerate these foreign-born races, nor the adherents of the Catholic church, and he comes here now and asks us to be more intolerant even than that. He asks us to proscribe a whole race, not only to the extent to which he proscribed foreign-born races, but to go further and proscribe them from the human family and rank them with the brute creation. And he asks us to do this in the name of toleration. "Strange that a man's mouth can run on thus."

It has been often said of late that history repeats itself. Of course it cannot be literally true; but the gentleman cites it, and then proceeds to search for the prototype of the terrible drama now being enacted on this continent, and affects to find it in the Revolution of 1776. Having settled this point to his own satisfaction, he proceeds to assign to the living actors their historic parts. The rebels take the position of the colonial revolutionists, the Government of the United States reënacts the part of George III and his ministers, while for himself and the Opposition debaters of this House he selects the honorable rôle of Chatham, Fox, Burke, and other champions of colonial rights in the British Parliament. Let us examine this. It is true that the colonists rebelled against the Government of Great Britain, and the slaveholders rebelled against the Government of the United States; but here the likeness ends. Between the circumstances that might provoke or justify rebellion in the two cases there is no resemblance. The Government from which the colonies separated was three thousand miles beyond the seas. They could not even communicate with it in those days in less than two or three months. In that Government they had no representation, and their wants and wishes no authoritative voice. Nor was it the form of government most acceptable to the colonists. They preferred a republic. The rapidly increasing population and the geographical extent and position of the colonies demanded nationality. Sooner or later it must come. The tea tax and other trifling grievances only hurried on an event that was sure to occur from the influences of geography and population alone. How is it in these respects with the present rebellion? The Government against which the slaveholders rebelled was not a foreign one; it was as much theirs as ours. They were fully represented in it. There was scarcely a law, indeed I think there was not a single law, upon the statute-book to which they had not given their assent. It was the Government they helped to make, and it was made as they wanted it. They had ever had their share of control and patronage in it, and more than their share, for they boasted with much truth that cotton was king. Nor is there any geographical reasons in their favor. It is conceded even by the rebels themselves that a division of the territory lying compactly between the Lakes and Gulf, the Atlantic and the Mississippi, into two nations would be a great misfortune to both. If it were the Pacific States demanding separation, bad as that would be, there would be some sense in it; but for this territory you cannot even find a dividing line. When you attempt to run one the rivers and mountains cross your purpose. Both the land and the water oppose division. There is no disunion outside the wicked hearts of these disloyal men. I can see no resemblance, then, between our patriot fathers, who toiled through a seven years' war to establish this beneficent Government, and the traitors who drench the land in blood in an attempt—I trust in God a vain one—to destroy it.

Again, sir, in what respect do the apologists of the present rebellion in this House resemble the advocates of our great Revolution in the British Parliament? Conceding they are their equals in statesmanship, learning, eloquence, and wit, I submit that they fall far below them in the merit of their respective causes. Chatham defended the cause of the colonists as set forth in the Declaration of Independence "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—the honorable gentleman from New York pleads for slavery, the auction block, the coffin, the lash. With slavery he cures all national troubles. He begs for harmony among ourselves. How shall we be united? "Restore slavery," says he. He is opposed to war. How then shall rebels in arms be subdued? "Revive the traffic in blood." He is opposed to taxes. How then shall our exhausted Treasury be replenished? "Raise more children for the market." Slavery, more slavery, still more slavery, is the only prescription of the Opposition doctors. If we are to look for the representatives of these great men on this side of the Atlantic I would not select them from among those who, born and raised in the free States, with all their moral and educational advantages, had not yet quite virtue enough when the struggle came to be patriots, nor quite courage enough to be rebels, but I would rather select them from such men as Johnson, of Tennessee, or Davis, of Maryland, who, born and educated amid the influences of slavery, still stood up for the Union cause at first almost alone. But, sir, the representatives of these men are to be found now as they were then on the other side of the Atlantic, the leaders of the Liberal party in the British Parliament.

There is another party that figures largely in the history of the revolutionary struggle that the gentleman entirely omitted to name. He gave them no place in his cast of parts. The omission may be attributed to either modesty or forgetfulness. Prior to the Revolution the members of this party had filled all the places of honor and profit in the colonies, and when the war came they heartily espoused the cause of the king, though they did not generally join his armies. Their principal business was to magnify disaster, deprecate success, denounce the currency, complain of the taxes, and denounce and dodge arbitrary arrests. To the patriot cause they were ever prophets of evil. Failure was their word. The past was a failure, the future would be. In the beginning of the war this party was in the majority in some of the colonies, and constituted a large minority in all, but as the war progressed their numbers constantly diminished. Many of the leaders were from time to time sent beyond the "lines" and their estates confiscated. Most of these settled in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, right handy to the place where the gentleman informs us he was born. This party was called Tory, and if this war is but a repetition of the war of the Revolution, as the gentleman intimates, where are their present representatives?

Again exclaims the gentleman, "You cannot subjugate eight million people." I know not which most to condemn in this expression, (I speak it of course without personal application,) its insinuation of falsehood or its confession of cowardice. The United States does not propose to subjugate any portion of its people but only to exact obedience to law from all. It is this misrepresentation of the purpose of the Government that still keeps alive the dying flames of the rebellion. I can go further with perfect truth, and say it was this misrepresentation that lighted those flames at the first. The slaveholders were told that it was the purpose of this Administration to destroy their personal and political rights; next they were reminded that they were proud, brave, chivalric men, and then tauntingly asked if they were going to submit. They were thus fairly coaxed and goaded into rebellion. Except for this misrepresentation the Union people would have been in a large majority in all the slave States, and despite it they are in a majority in more than half of them to-day if they could be heard. But they are gagged, bound hand and foot by a despotism so cruel and so mean, so thorough and so efficient, that even the gentleman from New York has no fault to find with it. The country is too much engaged now with the immediate actors in the drama to look behind the screens for the authors and prompters of the play. But when these actors have disappeared from the stage, gone down to graves never to be honored, or wandering among strangers never to be loved; in the peaceful future, when inquisition shall be made for the contrivers, instigators, aiders, and abettors of this great crime, the two classes so often coupled in denunciation in this Hall, the abolitionists of the North and the fire-eaters of the South, will be scarcely noticed, but the quiet historian will "point his slow, unmoving finger" at those northern leaders who for fifteen years have deceived the South and betrayed the North. They will stand alone. The large minority that now gathers around them, moved thereto more in hopes to escape the severe hardships of the war than from any love of them or their position, will have melted away from their support like dissolving ice beneath their feet, and well will it be for their posterity if they can manage then, like Byron's wrecks, to sink into the "Depths with bubbling groan, Without a grave, unknell'd, unc coffin'd, and unknown."

Subjugate the South! No, sir; it is the purpose as it is the duty of the Government to liberate the South, to drive out the usurpers, and to restore to the deluded and betrayed masses the blessings of a free Republic.

But the gentleman not only misrepresents the purpose of the Government to inflame the insurgents, but also misrepresents the extent of the rebellion to discourage the people in their efforts to subdue it. Where does he find his eight million hostile people? Allowing for West Virginia and East Tennessee, the whole white population of the eleven States that pretended to secede does not much exceed one half that number. A large portion of these are now within the Union lines, professing no more hostility to the Government than the gentleman himself. Of those that remain under the power of the usurper a considerable number, in some localities more than half, do not desire a separate Government, but would gladly accept the protection and privileges of the United States if sure that they were beyond the reach of their present oppressors. Where then, I ask again, does the gentleman find his eight million people? Does he mean to include the colored population of those States? I suppose not; they are to be tolerated only as brutes. He would not of course include them under the head of people. I do not suppose he intended to include any portion of his own party. I have a right to conclude, then, that this number was only a slashing estimate to make out a bad case. With half the white and all the black population in these seceded States, it would be very strange if the Government were not strong enough to compel submission from the rest. The gentleman himself gives some little encouragement. The little State of Maine (in which he tells us just in this connection he was born) is a match for England, France, and Russia, and he finally adds for all Europe combined.

Now, sir, if this little State which had only the honor of rocking his cradle, that claimed him only in long frocks and petticoats, could withstand all Europe single-handed, is it not reasonable to suppose that, combined with the State of his adoption, the great State of New York, that possesses him in all the glory of pantalooned manhood, it could flog the world and the "rest of mankind," in which I suppose the rebels would be included? Maine can be relied upon for the contest, so can New York, since no perfidious hand now holds the helm, and the gentleman himself gives some hope that he may be goaded into the support of his struggling, suffering country. There is a point, he tells us, beyond which his forbearance will not go. It was not reached when the rebels seized our forts, navy-yards, arsenals, ships-of-war, mint, and custom-houses, mails and post offices. It was not reached when they fired upon Sumter. It was not reached when they raised an army, hoisted a traitor flag, and laid siege to the capital. It was not reached when they put pirates on the ocean to seize, rob, and burn the peaceful merchant vessels from his own city. It was not reached when they raised the black flag and shot down our patriot soldiers after surrender and then burned the hospitals over the heads of the sick and wounded. It was not reached when they murdered women and children and unarmed men, and burned the villages on the border without military motive. It was not reached when by the slow torture of hunger and cold they murdered by the thousand our dear brave boys, prisoners of war in their hands. But he has an ultimatum notwithstanding. He announces it from his place in this Hall, and boldly flings it in the teeth of the rebels, and has the courage to hope that they may hear him. They must not go too far nor presume too much upon his forbearance. He will not stand everything. The insults and crimes I have named he can endure, forgive, forget; but if they dare to inspect his baggage as he travels South, he "will not submit; never, never," he repeats. "Will you fight them?" inquires the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Wilson.] Mark now the pluck of his answer. "When the day and hour come I will be ready to mark out the course I will pursue." Cambronne alone can answer that. It is fortunate for the rebels that the honorable gentleman has not yet learned that the privilege so highly prized has been denied him for three years and a half.

Again, centralization, the absorption of all local and municipal authority by the Federal Government, is another lion in the way of emancipation. What possible connection is there between centralization and emancipation? Why should one follow the other? Emancipation has been going on quite rapidly for two or three years; has the gentleman's city lost any of its municipal rights in consequence? Is it not still ruled by the "Five Points" majority, with nothing to fear but its own mobs? Does it not still elect corrupt men for judges, and thieves to the councils? Let the gentleman look at home with his fears. It is his own city that is centralizing, centralizing all the disloyalty and depravity of the North, and here he should begin his labors.

Mr. BROOKS. I can stand any amount of personal abuse toward myself, and fail to reply to it; but when he speaks thus of the city which I in part represent, I am bound to say that an effort was made by the Federal Government during the pendency of the late presidential election to control the city of New York by sending there a bold robber, in the person of a major general of the United States. Robber as he was of the public Treasury, and major general of the United States as he was, he dared not exercise the power given to him to attempt to control the actions of those whom the gentleman calls thieves and robbers in my own city. Thieves and robbers!—

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield to a speech from the gentleman, because he has had his time. [Cries of "Ah! Ah!" from the Democratic side of the House. Counter cries of "Let him go on!" from the Republican side of the House.] If the gentleman has any question to put to me I will hear him.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I stand any amount of personal attack on myself, but when my own constituents are called thieves and robbers, and when thieves and robbers are said to govern the metropolis of this country, I put it to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania if, after making such imputations, it is propriety, it is decency, to refuse to give me here an opportunity, in the midst of a speech like that, to defend the million of people whom I represent from that imputation against them as thieves and robbers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the only assault that I made on the city of New York was merely to repeat the allegations of its own papers.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman desires merely to ask me a question I will yield to him; but if he wishes to make a speech I must decline.

Mr. WARD. The attack was most infamous and outrageous.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If I have made any attack upon the constituents of the gentleman, [Mr. Brooks,] I have learned what I am stating from the gentleman's own paper, which has denounced again and again the election of certain persons to the councils of New York, and branded them as thieves.

I was going on to say, sir, that slavery has always been a centralizing power in this country. Of late years the Government itself has been subsidiary to it. It is said that a railroad corporation in New York, with a capital of only a few million dollars, controls the State. It selects its agents in all the counties, and works unseen for their promotion. If in this way it fails to secure a majority, the deficiency is made up by appliances to the wants and weaknesses of its opponents.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am very nearly through; and I would be glad if the gentleman would let me conclude.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield, or decline to yield, to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SCOFIELD. If it be only for a question, I shall yield.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to know to what corporation the gentleman refers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I refer the gentleman to the New York Express. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRUYN. That is not a regular corporation.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I only alluded to the railroad for the sake of illustration. Slavery had a capital of at least $2,000,000,000, as much under the control of a few men as if it were a corporation with a president and directors. It was this investment, thus centralized, that has been so appropriately and expressively, but to some people very offensively, called the "slave power." Its control over the finances, trade, and politics of the country was almost supreme. It controlled the slave States by community of interest; by this agency it then selected the President of the United States, and through his patronage controlled the free States. It may be said without exaggeration that it owned the South, used the Government, and hired the North. Emancipation will rid the country of this centralizing power, and if the gentleman is really opposed to centralization he ought to vote for it.

The gentleman closes his remarks with an appeal to the friends of the Administration to stop the war but save the Union. If our armies are withdrawn from the territory claimed by the rebel leaders the war will be stopped undoubtedly, but the Union will be divided. South of the Ohio and Potomac there will be another Government, practically recognized by us and formally acknowledged by all other nations. But on the other hand, if the rebels can be induced to disband their armies the war will cease and the Union be preserved. Now, sir, in imitation of the honorable gentleman, I will close my remarks with an appeal to him and his political associates to aid in the accomplishment of this latter result. Do you inquire what you can do? Go and proclaim to the deluded supporters of Jefferson Davis two simple truths. First, that the United States does not now and never did seek their subjugation, but only their submission to law. Tell them that the first election of Mr. Lincoln did not involve any interference with slavery in the States where it then existed, and that subsequent emancipation originated not in the virtue of the Government but in the necessities created by their own misconduct. If slavery was their motive for separation, the removal of that motive by the removal of slavery was our necessity. Whatever has been constitutionally done in that direction by congressional, State, or executive action must remain unless it is undone by authority equally constitutional. That they must submit to the Constitution in all its parts, including that which authorizes its own amendment. Second, tell them that while the United States asks nothing more from them than submission to law, it will accept of nothing less; and above all, it will not consent to its own dismemberment and the creation of two Governments between the Gulf and the Lakes. Tell them that the people have the will and the power to sustain this purpose of the Government. Though they are accustomed to spend their money with economy and do not wantonly shed their blood, they have made up their minds, from high convictions of duty, to bear with patience whatever loss and sufferings the execution of this purpose may entail. Tell them that while the Government and people are thus determined, they are not vindictive. They do not raise the black flag, but constantly tender to the deluded masses pardon and protection. Go tell these two facts to the insurgent people, hitherto misinformed and misled by your untruthful allegations, and you will see them begin to drop away from their reckless leaders, and with the blossoms of the coming spring will come the sweeter blessings of peace.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not presume, Mr. Speaker, to reply at this time to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania in the fullness of his argument. So far as he adhered to the legitimate subject of the debate, I listened to him with pleasure; and I may say that it was one of the few occasions in debate on this floor when the subject under discussion has been handled ably and wittily. But when the gentleman left the legitimate subject of debate to enter into a low slander of my constituents, and finds an excuse for that slander in some words uttered by my colleague, [Mr. Brooks,] I do not know whether to condemn most the cowardice of the act or the meanness of the insinuation. The taking refuge from the consequences of his own slanderous charge behind some words uttered by a Representative of New York, is indeed a depth of human cringing which is lamentable to witness, and shows that the slander uttered by himself is a burden too heavy for him to bear.

Sir, the people of the city of New York require no defense at my hands at any time, and still less from the attack of the gentleman, [Mr. Scofield.] That gentleman is himself a son of the State of New York, and comes here by the suffrages of those among whom, as a wanderer, he was forced to seek a home. It is, indeed, a poor resource for him to attempt to strengthen his argument on national questions by stabbing his native State and defaming his fellow-citizens. What is the constituency of the city of New York compared with any other in this country, that it should be singled out for attack? Is the Golconda of America so poor that she can find no friends here? The treasures that have been poured from her vaults, earned by the enterprise of her citizens, and the arms of her citizen soldiery and well-organized system of police which protect that treasure, her volunteers in your armies, and her sailors in your navies, some of whom come from the dregs of the people, if you please, and live many of them in Five Points perhaps, but who bear your banners to victory; these form the nucleus of a power equal to the famous maritime republics of old, and which in modern times is looked on with pride as the emblem of the success of our institutions, as the unanswerable proof of the strength of the American Government, and above all of the capacity of the American people to rule themselves. And nowhere else on this continent is found so noble an example of self-government; nowhere else is there a city of interests so various, of proportions so vast, and of population so dense, consisting of every language, nation, and race; nowhere else is self-government so essential, and nowhere else was it more nobly won and more firmly maintained.

Sir, I do not undertake the advocacy of New York; she needs no voice to proclaim her glory, her greatness, and her goodness. I do not wish to assail the motives of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I leave it to my colleague, [Mr. Brooks,] whom he has personally assailed, to answer him on these points of defamation which he, a son of the State of New York, has been willing to heap upon his native State.

If the gentleman wishes to find an instance of toleration, which he so ably advocates in behalf of the slave, extended to all mankind, he will find it in the crowded population of the city of New York. All creeds meet there in harmony. No collision between numerous and opposing sects mars the sacred Sabbath day when all go up to worship. The marts of business, crowded with all the evidences of thrift and industry, witness no disturbance from those who he declares rule us. And on election day, year after year, I defy any testimony to show that the power which rules the city of New York deserves any but the highest congratulation, the noblest and most earnest praise from every man who appreciates the lesson of self-government taught by a crowded and tumultuous city.

And the allusion made by my colleague, [Mr. Brooks,] in regard to the most uncalled-for interference by the Federal Government at the time of the last general election, is in itself a proof that no such class as the gentleman alluded to holds dominion there. Insulted by a fleet of the United States riding in her harbors, ready to send its soldiery to trample down our rights and interfere with our franchises, even that was borne patiently and calmly by our people, confident that they were capable of self-government, and believing—and I had hoped that they had a trust which would be realized—that the Representatives of the people of the United States at large in Congress assembled would appreciate their noble forbearance and deprecate the outrage committed against them.

It is to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] that we have to look for a response. No sympathy, but abuse and scorn are the first tokens that come from this House and this Administration; and, if we may judge from the spirit he has evinced, it is a deep-seated feeling of hostility to the community which has dared for the sake of principle, in the face of the overwhelming power of this Government, steadfastly to oppose the encroachments of the ruling power here, while they generously gave their best blood and their means to carry on the war.

But I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. Brooks,] if he desires to answer this matter further. I leave this subject with him.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CHANLER. I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield the floor.

Mr. CHANLER. I yielded the floor to my colleague, [Mr. Brooks,] at his request.

Mr. BROOKS. There is nothing which I more deprecate than these personalities of debate. I have ever endeavored, and shall ever endeavor, to avoid them. But the labored essay of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] imposes upon me the necessity of replying, if not for my own defense, which I should have been willing to leave to the House, at least to other parts of his essay, which seem to call for some immediate notice on my part.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] closes his essay, with an appeal to me, in reply to my appeal to the President, "Go yourself to the South, and assure that South that they are not to be subjugated by the people of the North; that such is not the intention of the people of the United States." Now I will ask the honorable gentleman how it is possible for me to go to the South. I will say to him that if to-morrow he could afford me an opportunity to go to the South with the assent of the President of the United States, there is nothing that would so much delight and gladden my heart as to go there, and to repeat to them what I think would be useful to induce the people of the South again to come back into this Union.

I would preach to them the utter hopelessness of their contest; I would preach to them that if they desired or intended any of that sort of independence which would close to us the rivers and harbors of the South and make them to us as a foreign nation, it never, never would be submitted to by the people of the North. I would try, in the message I might carry them from the President or authorities of the United States, directly or indirectly, to assure them that even large portions of the Republican party, in my judgment, would be glad to receive them back into this Union upon the basis of State rights and self-government under the Constitution, recognizing only the supreme authority of that instrument, and even without the abolition of slavery.

I think that if the South and North can again be brought to reason together and hear men of opposite and conflicting opinions, this Union might be restored without a further contest of arms or the shedding of more blood. I do not believe that that party which had only about four hundred thousand majority the last election in a poll of about four million votes has not patriotic men enough in it to join with us in declaring that the South may come back into this Union again, and come back as they left it, if they will come back, in obedience to the Constitution of the United States, their Constitution as well as ours, and, if possible, more the handiwork of their fathers than of ours.

But how am I to go South to carry the message of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania? How am I to reach the southern people? How am I to be heard beyond the Potomac at all? The laws of the land forbid any intercourse between the North and the South; the military authorities interpose an insuperable barrier. It is impossible to pass the lines of our armies. Not only is this forbidden to myself and others of my own party, for fear we would preach peace, but even members of the dominant party cannot undertake anything of that kind without interference on the part of the authorities of the United States to prevent it. Two honorable gentlemen, whose names are well known in the history of this country—names recognized as identified with the best days of the Jacksonian Democratic party—gentlemen who later were Fremont men and friends of Mr. Lincoln too, one of them late a Cabinet officer, went but the other day, apparently with an olive-branch in their hands, into the army of General Grant, by the permission, if not by the sanction, of the President of the United States; and, if the newspapers be correct in their reports, a telegram was sent by the Secretary of War forbidding their entrance into the rebel dominions, even with that olive-branch which they were supposed to bear in their hands. If, then, men high in the confidence of the Administration party are not permitted by the Secretary of War to go to the South and reason with the southern people, how can such an humble individual as I ever be expected to go and to remove any delusions there?

I do not believe that the great mass of the northern people desire the continuance of this war only for the abolition of slavery. Am I right, or am I wrong? Is the abolition of slavery the only object for which this war is hereafter to be prosecuted, or is now prosecuted? I do not believe it. I believe that large masses even of the Republican party would consent to receive back the southern States into this Union, with or without slavery, upon the single condition of their obedience to the Constitution of the United States. If I might be permitted to proclaim that fact in the southern country, and the southern people would hear me—if I might be permitted to proclaim it from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, with the sanction of the President of the United States, I have no doubt that the very promulgation of that fact would do more toward bringing about a cessation of hostilities upon the part of the rebels than any armies that we are likely to bring against them for twenty years to come.

But, sir, the honorable gentleman in the course of his essay stepped far out of his way to read New York a lecture for her sins, her iniquities, her crimes. The last of all places from which a lecture to New York should ever come is the State of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania rebuking

New York! Satan rebuking sin! The records of Pennsylvania, in the lobby and out of the lobby, will bear no investigation here or elsewhere. And though New York State may not be a paradise, and though New York city is far from being a perfect city, yet the very stews of corruption and iniquity in the city of New York are virtue itself in comparison with the Legislature of Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. A. MYERS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Myers,]?

Mr. BROOKS. I want no interlude here.

Mr. A. MYERS. I only want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BROOKS. I want no interlude here. I desire at the present time to deal only with the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. Scofield.]

Pennsylvania rebuking New York! The very proposition of itself is absurd and ridiculous! Why, whenever any of the mere Pennsylvania politicians go to New York the first place they visit, the cradle in which they are rocked, is the classic spot described by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania as the "Five Points" of the city of New York. [Laughter.] It is the great Mecca where Pennsylvania pilgrims go. It is the source of their inspirations, and too often of their action. And if the records of the New York police were searched they would in many instances exhibit a record by no means creditable to too many of the citizens of Pennsylvania. Sir, New York is not without its sin, is not without its crime. But it is the refuge-place of the whole country, and, first and foremost of them all, of that State contiguous to it—the honorable State of Pennsylvania.

Sir, I deprecate this species of discussion; but when my own State is denounced as subject to the New York Central railroad, and when it is asserted that thieves and robbers govern the million of people of the city of New York, there is no language sufficiently strong, sufficiently denunciatory to hurl back upon those who make such charges; and those who do it should have spotless characters, should come from a spotless State, and least of all from the State of Pennsylvania. There is not an enterprise of any kind or character in Pennsylvania which does not come to New York to be cradled and nursed up—coal, iron, &c., &c. That great interest which the honorable gentleman himself represents, the interest of petroleum, has its representation in the city of New York. If there be a farm for sale in the gentleman's district which may or may not have petroleum in it, and especially if it have not, it is bought by himself or some other for $1,000, and is then valued in New York at one or two millions, and represented as being worth more than the gold mines of Montana or California or Nevada.

But, Mr. Speaker, let that pass. Let it all pass. I will not enter into any labored eulogium to vindicate New York from undeserved assaults. My colleague [Mr. CHANLER] has set that all right. The empire city, sir, best speaks for itself. The spires of its hundreds of churches that point to heaven are not more numerous than its charities on earth. There is no place from the arctic to the antarctic where the poor and humble are so well taken care of as in the city of New York. There are no more noble and well-directed charities in London, or Paris, or elsewhere, than are in the great city of New York. A beggar need never walk its streets in suffering or affliction, for if he applies to the proper authorities there are even palaces to which he will be sent.

Then what has New York, calumniated New York, unpatriotic, copperhead New York, done in this war? What, sir, is its history? When the Administration has been most in need of money where has it gone but to the great city of New York? Where did it receive its first contributions? Where has been its last resource? Who are the largest shareholders in the public loans? Whose money has been poured forth so liberally as that of the great capitalists of the city of New York? In the earliest period of this war how were our troops put into the field but by the contributions of the city of New York? And when this Capitol was imperiled a regiment of that city, composed of the sons of the wealthiest citizens, men of wealth, often worth from one to two hundred thousand dollars, as common soldiers in the seventh regiment, among them my own colleague from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] they left their homes, palaces I will say, generously came here and encamped upon the heights around about, to drive back the enemy that then threatened. There were not only such citizens of New York in that distinguished regiment, but the Irish-born citizens, men from the stewards and bagnios, of whom the gentleman so sincerely spoke. Yes, sir, the Irish regiments of the city of New York, and the German regiments of New York, men who were here hardly long enough to comprehend the English language, in the ebullition of patriotism, as the trumpet call came from Washington, poured forth, regiment after regiment, in thousands of thousands of men, until the Secretary of War, Mr. Cameron, said to that metropolitan city, "We have more regiments of soldiers than are necessary for the protection of the capital." Sir, New York city has responded to every call of the President to arms; even that New York which cast nearly thirty-eight thousand majority against his politics and his policy, and which would have increased that vote to forty-two or forty-three thousand if the short days of November had not excluded thousands of its honest voters from the polls.

Yet the honorable gentleman indulges in his imputations against the patriotism of the city of New York. Sir, if any honorable gentleman chooses ever to indulge in any such flings or sarcasms, last of all should outcry come from him, a Representative from Pennsylvania. Pending the invasion of the rebels before the battle of Antietam, when even Pennsylvanians could not be aroused to the defense of their own State, when her citizens fled back, when the legions of the enemy surrounded Washington and came down through the mountains of Pennsylvania, the soldiers of New York hastened from all parts, from their houses and homes, to help with the gallant men of the Army to drive back the enemy. But for the gallant regiments from the city of New York, and from the State of New York, whose Governor [Seymour] the gentleman has so slanderously traduced to-day, who knows but that Lee would have engulfed the capital of Pennsylvania, and captured and sacked the city of Philadelphia itself? Least of all should he speak against the noble State which saved Pennsylvania. The foot of the enemy, sir, has never trod upon the soil of New York. It is a virgin soil, and during this whole war will continue to be a virgin soil. I cannot say the same of the State from which the honorable gentleman comes, whose soil has been degraded by the rebel army again and again; whose cities have been plundered and burned by the rebel army. Yet the honorable gentleman has here, this day, denounced as unpatriotic, as ignoble, as thieves and robbers, the gallant soldiers as well as the citizens of the Empire State, which I have the honor in part to represent.

But let that pass also. I deprecate these personalities. I mourn the occasion that tempts me to enter into them. I wish the report of the debate could be suppressed and not entered upon the congressional records of the country. What I have said has been only in defense of my own city and State. I indulge in no unkind feelings toward Pennsylvania. Nay, I am sure the honorable gentleman only represents himself in his denunciation of New York, and when I speak, as I do speak, I speak only to him, and to no other Pennsylvanian upon the floor.

Let that pass while I refer to another matter of history. The honorable gentleman, in the course of his essay, alleged that from the formation of the Government the South has domineered and controlled in the Halls of Congress and throughout the country.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? I did not say the "South;" I referred all through the debate to the institution of slavery.

Mr. BROOKS. The institution of slavery represented by the southern men upon the floor of this House—accept the words—and yet the institution never was here upon the floor of the House. They were the southern representatives of the institution.

Sir, that course of remark has been so often indulged in that I am inclined to believe the great body of the members on that side of the House, and those they represent, now believe that we northern-born men, we Yankee men, have been controlled and domineered over by an oligarchy or an aristocracy of the South. It is not true; from beginning to end the declaration is not true, and it is an ignoble confession upon the part of those who make it. Northern men followers even of southern men; controlled and domineered over by them upon the floor of this House! We, an inferior race; they, a superior race of men, born to govern! Never, never; there is no such record in the history of our country.

The South has had one great advantage over the North here, and that is by its continuous representation upon the floor of this House. Under our northern miserable system of representation, every two or four years, after a man has been educated to a place in this body, after he has come to know its rules, and understand his duties, after he has become trained and educated as a statesman, then at that hour the political wheel rolls him out, and a green man comes here to meet the Representatives of the South who have been here ten, twenty, thirty, and even forty years; men not born superior to us, but superior to us in their training and education, and always therefore exercising that power and authority over the House of Representatives and over Congress which superiority of training and education always have given, and ever will give, as well to northern as to southern men.

Whenever our northern men have been kept here as long as John Quincy Adams was—and I name but one name of a representative man for that side of the House; whenever such men have been kept in Congress or in public life, year after year, they have had no superior in the South, and seldom if ever their equal either in this Hall or in the other House of Congress. But if green men are brought here every two years to act against the trained veterans of the South, the South will have larger influence and authority over this country than northern men, and be given the offices as the best fitted men.

But even with all this disadvantage the statement is not true, for northern policy, northern measures, northern commerce, northern trade, banking, and money-making, have governed this country from the foundation of the Government. Our tariffs have been imposed upon the South for the protection of our manufactures and the development of our internal improvements. We have made money out of the South at will. We have been their commission merchants, their factors, their freighters, their manufacturers, and they have been but our overseers to use their negroes to work for our benefit. We have fattened by our political policy upon that labor; and we have built up our cities and our country by the use we have made of the South, and in that way we have governed the southern country. If their men have been longer in public life, and held more public places, it is the fault of our political system, but wherever a dollar was to be made, wherever a law was to be enacted for the benefit of commerce, of trade, or of manufactures, the North has almost always governed and the South has almost always obeyed. The North has made the money under the Government, if more than a fair proportion of southern men have administered that Government.

Nor has the South here in this House, and upon this floor, always had its way, even with its able men. I was here in the great struggle of 1850, when the ablest men of the South were upon the floor of the adjoining Hall exercising all their power to bring California into the Union as a slave State, and to extend slavery to the Pacific; and in that they failed. I recollect their arguments. I myself was engaged in a warm debate on that subject with Mr. Toombs, of Georgia; and in the course of the argument, when he was claiming that California should be open to the representatives and institutions of Georgia and South Carolina, as well as to those of New York, he asked me a question which I found it easier to evade than to answer. Did not, he asked, a regiment from New York city and a regiment from South Carolina, in the march from Vera Cruz to Mexico, at Chapultepec, I think he said, fight side by side and shoulder to shoulder to conquer the Mexicans; and when the victory was won and the treaty made and the common territory acquired for which these soldiers of New York and South Carolina had fought and the country had paid for in common, was it, he asked, just and right and equitable that the son of the South Carolina soldier, or that soldier himself, should be forbidden to emigrate, carrying his institutions with him, into California and the rest of the territory thus acquired, side by side with the citizen of New York? I evaded the question, I must confess. I found it difficult to answer. I answered it to the best of my ability, although not altogether satisfactorily to myself.

I mention this incident, which was but one of the many incidents of that great and prolonged debate, during which the men of the North stood together, I think, for six months upon the floor of the House of Representatives, contending and with great success for the exclusion of slavery from California and from all the Pacific coast, and then the South was fully and ably represented here, never more ably represented than then. The North, and I among the northern Representatives, stood up shoulder to shoulder, and successfully, too, for we excluded slavery from California by its admission as a free State. Slavery was forbidden by the compromise of 1850 to enter any of the territory which we acquired from Mexico on the Pacific coast.

How untrue is it, then, how anti-historical is the declaration, that upon the floor of the House of Representatives the South has always governed and always had the control.

Sir, when Florida was annexed to this Union, that annexation of which the honorable gentleman seems to complain, Florida, though a slaveholding State, was annexed more for the benefit of the shipping and commerce of the North than for the South. The Gulf of Mexico—

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. BROOKS. I am occupied with the gentleman from Pennsylvania now.

Mr. HIGBY. My question is in relation to California, to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. BROOKS. I must decline to yield.

Mr. HIGBY again addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield, and is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not like to hear any falsehoods stated about my own State.

Mr. BROOKS. Sir, when Louisiana was added to this Union, what was Louisiana? A slaveholding French State. Slavery was the binding law of that vast territory. The Louisiana of that day was not the little State upon the Gulf and on the Mississippi, but it was Arkansas, it was Missouri; it was all that vast territory which stretches from the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean; and yet in our contest with the South in the compromise of 1820, when that territory was divided, we left to the South only Arkansas and Missouri, while as free territory we have planted the flag of the North upon all that vast region which now comprises Territories and States too numerous to mention.

Tell me not, then, that the South has governed the North. Tell me not that the North has ever been controlled by the South. It is not true. It is dishonorable to confess it and not less dishonorable to declare it on the floor of the House. The great free States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the free gift of slaveholding Virginia to the North, deny it. The North has always had its rights, here and elsewhere, whenever it has thought it worth the while to claim them.

The South was abolishing slavery when the abolition war commenced upon it thirty years ago, and in due time, by the operation of natural causes, slavery would have passed away from the face of the earth without any of this civil war. Civil war has interposed and created a catastrophe, and, perhaps, hastened the abolition of slavery, but amid how much bloodshed and carnage, and with what irreparable damage to all the free institutions of the North. Sir, we have abolished the slavery of the South, but in so doing we have become the slaves, the thralls, the bondmen of the capitalist of the North. We are mortgaged to them for life, ours and the coming generation, our children and our children's children. Our farms are mortgaged, our labor is mortgaged. We are "held to service" for life to earn enough to pay the interest upon the principal of the great debt. The capitalists own us as much as capitalists in England own the people of England. For the emancipa-tion of the negroes of the South we have enslaved the white people of the North to everlasting debt. And this is our destiny because we have attempted to hasten the order of time which God's providence would have at length brought about. Repeat not, then, to make an impression on the country, statements that are not true, not historical, not borne out by the record.

But, Mr. Speaker, if, as alleged, I have erred in an ardent desire for peace, if I am too credulous in the belief that there ought to be peace, or that the South would yield peace with a restoration of the Constitution and the Union, it is a credulity of which I am not ashamed, and for which the Prince of Peace will forgive me. It is a divine and Christian aspiration, now and hereafter, thus ever to hope for "peace on earth and good-will toward men." And however I may be calumniated as a copperhead or a traitor, despite all these or harsher words that may be fulminated against me, as long as I have life and power to speak, so long will I repeat the declaration of Scripture, "Peace on earth and good-will toward men."

Mr. BLISS obtained the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BLISS. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act to repeal the provisions of a law requiring certain regents of the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute; and Joint resolution tendering the thanks of the people and of Congress to Major General William T. Sherman, and the officers and soldiers of his command, for their gallant conduct in their late brilliant movement through Georgia.

And then, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 7, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. WILLIAM H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to extend the boundaries of the port of Philadelphia so as to include the district of Richmond on the north, and Greenwich Point on the south; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONDITIONAL ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas on the 15th day of December, 1864, the following resolution was adopted by this House, namely:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House copies of the order issued from his Department on the 21st day of December, 1863, in regard to recruits enlisted with conditions that they should be discharged when their regiments were mustered out of service; also, copy of order or letter dated 23d day of December, 1863, and addressed to the Governor of the State of Massachusetts, in regard to recruits to fill up old regiments; and that he inform the House whether the principles announced in the order above mentioned have been applied to all soldiers mustered into the service to fill up the old regiments."

To which resolution no response by the Secretary of War has been made: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House why the information required by the House has not been furnished, and that he be directed to furnish the same.

INSANE ASYLUM, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefit of the asylum for the insane in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage at this time; and I ask that the bill may be read, together with the paper accompanying it.

Before that is done, however, I will ask leave to state some facts. The present law upon the subject provides for the admission to the insane asylum, in this District, of persons employed in the Army and Navy of the United States and civilians in the District of Columbia. There are, however, certain persons in the employ of the Government, in the quartermaster's and commissary's departments, who are not now permitted this benefit. There are now one or more cases of insane persons in those departments who are not entitled to be admitted into any State asylum, having no friends in the country, and in whose cases the provisions of the existing laws do not apply. Representations have been made by the proper authority in regard to this matter. That paper, which I have sent to the desk, and now ask to have read, explains the necessity of the immediate passage of this bill, as a matter of mercy.

The following communication was then read by the Clerk:

OFFICE DEPOT COMMISSARY OF SUBSISTENCE,
WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., December 10, 1864.

GENERAL: I have the honor to represent that the law controlling and regulating the insane asylum near this city will not allow civil employes of the quartermaster's or subsistence departments, who become insane while in public employ, the benefit of it, if they are not permanent residents of the District. Within the last few months we have had several in this condition, one now under my charge, who I am unable to dispose of. He has no friends in this country, and humanity will not permit him to be turned loose in this dangerous condition. I would therefore most respectfully ask that the approval of the Secretary of War be solicited for the purpose of modifying or amending the law so as to authorize insane employes to be admitted in the same manner as enlisted men, when such employes are connected with the Washington and Alexandria depots or their branches.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. BELL,
Lieutenant Colonel and C. S. V. S.

General A. B. EATON, Commissary General of Subsistence, Washington, District of Columbia.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the bill, and also that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF UNCLAIMED FREIGHT.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize express and other transportation companies to sell unclaimed freight; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BOUNTIES AND ARREARAGES OF PAY.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide for the payment of bounties and arrearages of pay to mothers of certain soldiers who have fallen in battle, or have died in the service, and I ask that it be received and considered at the present time without any reference to a committee.

The bill was received and read at length.

It provides that the mothers of illegitimate sons who have died in the service shall receive the bounties and arrearages of pay the same as mothers of other soldiers who have fallen in battle or died in the service.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object to the consideration of this bill without a reference to a committee.

Mr. GRIDER. The whole substance of the bill is just this: mothers of illegitimate children who have fallen in battle cannot now receive the bounties and arrearages of pay as those can who have lost sons whose fathers are dead. This bill is intended to put both on the same footing.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow it to be referred it will be carefully examined.

Mr. GRIDER. Very well; I will consent to its reference.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TESTIMONY OF PARTIES IN INTEREST.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the third section of an act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, as to exclude the testimony of parties in interest in suits in the courts of the United States wherever administrators, executors, or guardians are parties.

DUTY ON LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a letter from Dulany, Harris & Co., Quincy, Illinois, in relation to the duty on leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REBEL DEPREDACTIONS ON LAKE ERIE.

Mr. HULBURD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House a copy of the report made by Major General Dix to the Secretary of War on the 30th of February, 1864, in regard to the rebel raid on Lake Erie, and the seizure of the steamers Philo Parsons and Island Queen.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to this resolution, if the call be made directly upon the Secretary of War. The rules of the House require that resolutions of this character shall be imperative in their form.

The SPEAKER. By the language of the resolution, the Secretary of War is "directed."

Mr. HOLMAN. "If not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. HULBURD. The reason for the introduction of that expression was that it was deemed possible that there might be something in the report which it would not be proper at this time to make public.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the resolution will be considered as introduced and agreed to.

There was no objection.

CONFISCATION OF DESERTERS' PROPERTY.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report at an early day upon the expediency of a law to confiscate for the Government, when practicable, so much of the property of conscripts who have failed to report for duty as may be required to secure the services of soldiers in their stead.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the business in which the House was engaged at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to the people whom I represent as a member of this body, to utter in their name some words of protestation against the immolation of the Constitution of the United States which is threatened by the representatives of the party which holds the majority of this House. In that sacred instrument is contained the life-blood of our Government, and in its fate is involved the highest mortal interest of the American people.

Revolution, leaping in the dark, is ever of the most dangerous tendency. We shall act foolishly as a nation if we allow ourselves for any selfish motive to forsake and spurn the well-tried principles and policy upon which our fathers built our Government, and from the just application of which nothing has resulted in opposition to peace, prosperity, and unprecedented national advancement. We shall act foolishly and rashly if we abandon the approved guarantees of national happiness and greatness which Heaven and the loftiest human wisdom have permitted us to possess, and adopt in their stead some untied and speculative policy, the realization of which is only in vague imaginations of an uncertain and imperiled future.

There are many reasons why I cannot, consistently with my conscience and my views of the true interest of my country, accord my vote to the initiatory step to what I regard as the revolutionary measure proposed. In the first place, and which alone is sufficient for my deterrent, it would involve me in the guilt of a willful violation of the solemn oath without which I could not have become a member of this body. That oath binds me, like many taken before it, to support, maintain, and defend the Constitution of the United States. That solemn obligation I have ever intended to keep, and cannot relax in my purpose now when the ax of a party majority is raised in an illegitimate way to strike down its provisions. The plain terms of the obligation preclude any attempt to change or destroy any of its provisions or guarantees, except by the lawful mode which itself provides, and which is laid down in its fifth article in the following words:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article, and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Upon what reasoning and recognition of facts does any member of this Congress claim the possible power, under the foregoing article, to take the initiatory steps to the change proposed? Are the States whose people, in part, are in rebellion against the General Government out of the Union in theory and in fact? Are they foreign Powers, and their inhabitants foreign people, not subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States? If so, why do we raise and send mighty hosts to enforce, by the sword, the bayonet, and the cannon, obedience and subjugation to that Constitution and to those laws? If the people of the so-called seceded States are not citizens in the Union, why are our courts engaged, under an act of Congress, in confiscating their estates for acts of treason against their Government? Treason implies citizenship; it cannot be committed by an alien or an enemy. If those States are not out of the Union in theory of law, and if their people owe the allegiance to the Government of the United States which is claimed of them, then clearly those States are among the number of States three fourths of whom must unite their voices upon any proposition to amend their Constitution.

That they are not so legally in the Union, and so to be regarded as States with a controlling portion of their people in rebellion, is a new and recently assumed proposition, and at war with every executive manifesto, proclamation, and declaration from the first act of secession till now. From the commencement of what every one has called rebellion the people of the Federal States, of all parties, and without distinction, have agreed upon the common idea and doctrine that ordinances of secession are null and void; that the sovereignty of the Constitution was unalterably fixed upon all the people of the realm, and on that faith, and that only, the Union-loving patriotism of the country has responded to all calls made by the military administration, and allowed the blood of the nation to be freely poured out and expended, and a grievous national debt to be incurred. Are we now to see the predominating party holding these great issues in its hands change front upon this vital question? If so, then manifestly, with the policy of the nation in their hands, there is no hope of a restoration of the Union. A change in our public councils must occur or we shall be stripped of the birthright which we most valued.

But were the proposed action practicable in a legal point of view, I should shrink from the policy as putting us upon untenable ground, and making us to assume the character of aggressors while we profess to be fighting against and punishing aggression—we, who ought in this terrible business, to have no stain upon our hands. Undoubtedly the rebellion is a great wrong; but it would certainly be meeting wrong with wrong to deny them their original constitutional rights in the Union when they shall have returned to it. Whoever wishes for their return should openly condemn all such policy. Whatever moral question may be involved in the subject of negro slavery in any State of the original Confederacy is a question for determination and settlement only by the people of such State. To abandon or maintain the institution according to the sense, will, and policy of the people of such local sovereignty, was an undisputed right before and at the time of their entering into the Federal Union; and the great compact of confederation, the Constitution of the United States, gave them no new right in that respect, but only guaranteed to them the undisturbed enjoyment of a preëxisting right, with such full recognition of the same throughout the country as should enable them safely to assert their right of property in the labor of slaves, even in the recapture of fugitives from their service in any State. By the amendment it is proposed to crush out a sovereign right and power which never was placed within the jurisdiction of any authority except the local sovereignty by whose laws it exists. Such is the main principle of the Government framed by Washington and his compeers. It cannot now be changed except by revolution.

The success of this proposition would dash the cup of hope from the lips of a majority of the people of all the adhering States. It is the desire of a great majority of our people to reconstruct the Union upon its old basis. Upon that basis compromise can be made and the war honorably closed; but upon no other or more restricted plan can it be done. Subjugation of the South, and sway over it, can be accomplished only by standing armies. We cannot dictate in any other way the abandonment of their constitutional and reserved rights. Can we afford the blood, the expense, the general suffering, the lack of all substantial success, which must attend upon such policy?

The pretense of a humanitarian motive toward the negroes amounts to nothing but a display of systematic and intense hypocrisy. All sensible men perceive that the negro slaves, whether held under the new bondage of the so-called freedmen, on confiscated plantations, or scattered in want and undeserved suffering over the North, are the much-abused and unfortunate victims of an unlawful interference with the protection and support to the benefits of which they were born; and that the best possible disposition of them is to restore them to their primal condition. They have been used as a party political instrumentality to their bitter cost, and they have sense enough to know that politicians cannot reverse the decree of Almighty God and make their race equal, socially or politically, with white men. Such may be the opinion of the fanatical politician; but the more sane mind of the negro, weak as it may be, has too much perspicacity not to perceive the deceptive bait which is thrown him. Many of them are now sighing for the happy homes from which they have been seduced.

Let us take honest counsel together and agree to let the Constitution alone, with the hope of restoring the happy old constitutional régime. That the Union may be restored and peace again pervade this distracted land, it needs only that the prevailing voice of the people should declare for an acquiescent administration of the Government according to the Constitution, which all Americans once acknowledged as the palladium of our national honor and glory. Upon such just and judicious proffer the States and the people could no longer be kept in severance. They would re-cohere with the power of magnetic attraction. Whoever disbelieves this is blind to the teachings of the most illustrative history and to the whole field of political cause and effect. Union men should do nothing to lessen or defer the probability of such a result, but hasten to apply the efficient cause by which it may be achieved.

I am aware that on this important occasion, which involves nothing less than a summing up and exhibit of all the Republican victories over the ballot-box and the denouement of the original purpose of that party, we must expect to hear, instead of a fair discussion of the great subject, the usual and familiar stump-speech poetry of the driver's lash, the horrors attendant upon the disfranchisement of "our brethren" by the aforesaid "sum of all villainies," that the awful importance of this bold attempt to despoil the American Constitution, considered in the effect its success will be likely to have upon our national condition, will not secure in this time and place a logical, dispassionate solution of the question presented, but that political partisanship on the part of the majority will furnish much of the influence controlling their acts.

The conservative members of this House should recognize a double duty in the crisis and eventful epoch of our history in which they are placed—the duty of respectful reverence for the wisdom and patriotism of those who were enabled to construct the grand edifice of statesmanlike thought and popular liberty which many seek now to subvert or overthrow, and also the high obligation resting upon them as trustees for a coming generation, who in the midst of sorrow and oppression may demand of them what they did in the time of mortal action for the preservation and transmission to them of their inheritable and inalienable rights.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the joint resolution submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. How much of the time which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] was entitled to occupy remains?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-five minutes. If, however, no other gentleman claims the floor, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Rogers] will be entitled to occupy one hour.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman from New Jersey will allow me a moment, I desire to ask whether it is the purpose to bring this question to a vote to-day.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MALLORY. Is a time fixed for closing the debate?

A MEMBER. Next Monday.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Ashley] will allow more time than that for the discussion of this question before we act on it finally.

Mr. ASHLEY. I stated yesterday that I had no design to press a vote; that whenever it might be the pleasure of the House to take a vote on the subject it would be satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] resumed his seat, no gentleman claimed the floor. Therefore, in the absence of a motion to postpone, the Chair was compelled to state the question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. PRUYN. I thought that the vote had been ordered to be taken on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Ashley] said that he would not ask a vote until Monday.

Mr. MALLORY. My reason for making the remark which I did was that I understood the Speaker to say that the gentleman from New Jersey would be entitled to the thirty-five minutes remaining of the time of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Bliss.]

The SPEAKER. No other gentleman claiming the floor, the gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to the floor in his own right for one hour.

Mr. COX. By permission of the gentleman I desire to say a word. Some members on this side of the House, who desire to discuss this question, are not prepared to do it now, and may not be on Monday. If gentlemen on the other side will consent that the taking of the vote shall be postponed till a week from next Monday, it will be agreeable to gentlemen on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to bind the House to any request which may be made, but I will say this to gentlemen on the other side of the House, that so far as I am concerned whenever a majority of the House desire a vote I shall have the privilege of demanding the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that before the adjournment to-day it be agreed to postpone the subject over to next Friday, which is also a private bill day, and that the discussion continue Friday and Saturday, when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. ASHLEY. I prefer for the present that the discussion should be continued to-day and Monday, and to leave it within the power of the majority of the House to take a vote whenever it may so decide. I will not call for a vote unless pressed by a majority.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, it is the first time in the history of this country, until the present party came into power, when any body of men claimed that in the Constitution of the United States, and by virtue of the laws of the several States before they formed it, each State had no right to legislate and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively. In this question there is not only involved at this time the propriety of interfering with the Constitution of the country, but behind that a grave and serious question, in my judgment, arises, whether there is any power in the confederated Government of this country by any act of legislation and confirmation of the Legislatures of three quarters of the States to interfere with the domain of any State whatever, or its right to control the institution of slavery or any other domestic institution, which was not delegated to the General Government but reserved to the States exclusively.

I say, sir, that all the parties of the country, not only the Democratic party, but the old Whig party, and the Republican party, until lately, always claimed and held that this institution of slavery was peculiarly under the province of the individual States, and that when the States entered into this confederated Government the powers that they did not delegate to that Government were expressly reserved to the States; that no power not delegated to the General Government could be by the force of any amendment to the Constitution be taken away from the States, because they had only confederated themselves together for the purpose laid down in the organic act, and because it would be an act of the creature not given by its creator.

If I understand the object of this Government, it was to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity; and I hold now, as the law of the land and as the well-settled principle laid down by the authors of the organic act and by all the great men who have written on the subject, that the institution of slavery belongs peculiarly and solely to the States, and that no thirty-three States, or any other number, by combining together have the lawful right to deprive a single State of an institution which was not delegated to the General Government, and which was reserved by the people when they entered into the confederation of States and formed the American Union. If it be true that the States where slavery existed never delegated the right to interfere with that institution, what right has the Congress of the United States or the people of other States, through their Legislatures, to interfere with slavery in another State, which institution is peculiarly and solely the creature of the State—a right which was never delegated to the General Government, and to interfere with which has always been held by all parties we had no right? Solely and alone it has been always held that the institution belonged exclusively to the jurisdiction of the States.

If Congress will take the pains to look over the platforms of the different political parties of the country they will find that for years and years they have iterated and reiterated the truth that the right of each State to control this domestic institution according to its own judgment exclusively was essential to the balance of power upon which our fabric of government depends. If you look at the platform adopted by the Republican convention at Chicago, which nominated Abraham Lincoln in 1860, you will find that it lays down that the right to control this domestic institution rests exclusively with the States, and that that right is essential to the perfection and endurance of our political institutions.

Now, if it was a principle of this Government, well recognized, that it was a right reserved to the States to legislate upon this subject according to their own internal will, it is a right which still exists. Because this country has been involved in a war; because a civil revolution has rocked the country from one end to the other; because it is now a question who is responsible for the war, that does not change a lawful principle if that principle existed before hostilities commenced; and we are bound now by the same rule, controlled by the same law and indubitable principle which never dies or passes away, and it is reserved to the people of the respective States to-day and hereafter to control and do as they see fit with that which was never delegated to the General Government, but expressly reserved to the respective States.

This institution of slavery is one which has existed time out of mind, which existed before our forefathers landed upon American soil, which is an institution imported from Great Britain and other countries, one in the progress of which large sums of money had been made, which had become a part and a feature of the government of the different States, and of the colonies of this country before the Declaration of American Independence and the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. No one will deny that before the formation of the Constitution, and at the time of the Declaration of Independence, the institution of slavery was exclusively under the jurisdiction and control of the organic law of the State in which it existed. If that is so, is there anything to be found in the organic law which shows that when those nine States first ratified the Constitution they delegated to the General Government any right whatever with regard to this institution? On the contrary, did they not, by the very language of the Constitution, reserve all powers not delegated to the General Government? And if they did reserve it to the people of the respective States, if it was an institution of the States, I ask any man how it is possible, by any amendment of the Constitution, for the General Government to become possessed of the right to legislate upon and control an institution the power over which was never delegated by the States when they entered into and framed the Constitution of the country?

You will find by looking at the organic law that those amendments which are provided for by it mean amendments which shall be germane to the organic law itself. The framers of it, the men who assembled in the old Halls of the Confederation in 1787, after having been purified by the glories and the triumphs of the Revolution, intended that amendments only should be made which were germane to the organic act, and which were within the purview of the powers which were delegated to the General Government. There is nothing in the Constitution which recognizes for one moment that the whole structure and framework of the Government may be amended or altered in reference to matters reserved to the States, matters never delegated to the General Government.

If the position in reference to the amendment of the Constitution taken by gentlemen on the other side of the House be true, then the other relations of the States, the marital rights, the rights of husband and wife, of parent and child, of master and servants; the right of licensing hotels, the right of making private contracts, the rights of courts, the manner in which they shall obtain evidence, the allowance of parties to be witnesses, the jurisdiction and powers of State courts, the rights of suffrage for State officers, constitutions of States and all the rights which now belong to the States, upon the same principle may be interfered with, abolished, and annulled. Those rights, like those connected with the institution of slavery, belong solely and exclusively to the jurisdiction of the States, and were never delegated to the General Government. Does any man here believe that Congress, by a constitutional amendment, can so far alter the organic law of the land as to interfere with marital relations in the States; interfere with the manner in which evidence shall be given; take away the constitutional provision that a man shall enjoy property by descent in certain ways defined by the organic law of a State and blot all States laws out of existence? I ask, do gentlemen here believe that by constitutional amendment the General Government would have a right to do away with all those express and reserved rights of the States, and which were never delegated to that General Government, and never constituted a part of the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States or of the people, except that the people of each State could act and legislate upon those individual concerns according to their own judgment exclusively, and the dictates of their own consciences?

You must remember that it is proposed by this amendment that the States in which slavery exists shall have no vote, because they are not in a position to exercise the right to vote upon this question. But it is proposed that three-fourths of the States—States wherein slavery does not exist; States which have no interest in that species of property—shall get together, and by the action of three-fourths of them deprive of their property the citizens of the loyal border States; the men who have braved this current of war, and shown the proudest and purest patriotism of any class of men on the face of the earth; the men who have invested their money in slave property; the men whose fathers fought side by side with the men of New York and New Jersey on the battlefields of the country to drive back the invaders of England. Shall it be said that under a republican Government, in a country supposed to be one of liberty, that we can trample on the rights of those men by taking their property without any compensation whatever, and robbing them of that which by the Constitution of the country is guaranteed to them, and which by the blood of their fathers who fought against the wickedness and tyranny of England was handed down to them to be perpetuated to them and their children and children's children unimpaired forever?

Does any man here believe that the members of the Convention that Washington and those men who assembled in Philadelphia to frame this sacred instrument, the representatives of the northern and southern States, who went there to carry out the will of their masters, the people, intended that when they reserved rights to the States and did not delegate them to the General Government, that three-fourths of the States, without the consent of the other one-fourth, could, by combining together under the form of an amendment, deprive the other States of these privileges which they wrested from King George, for which they fought, and which were guaranteed to them by the organic laws of their own States, and protected and defended in particular respects, to which I shall refer hereafter, by the organic law of the Union? I want to read one paragraph from the platform upon which the party which is represented upon the other side of the House established themselves at Chicago upon this question. They then held the doctrine which we now and ever have held. It was left for this revolutionary Republican party to proclaim a doctrine so destructive to the great interests of the citizens of this country, and the fundamental law of the land.

The third paragraph of the Republican platform reads that—

“The right of each State to legislate and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend.”

Now, is that true? Is the right of each State to legislate and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively essential to that balance of power upon which the perfection and endurance of our Republic depend? Was it true in 1860 that the right of each State to legislate and control its institutions in that way was necessary to the endurance of this political fabric? Why did the Republican party establish that platform? Why was Mr. Lincoln nominated upon that platform and go to the American people in 1860 and ask them to support him? Why, it was because he knew, as the old Whig and Democratic parties and all parties had known, that no amendment to the Constitution by the interference of Congress, or of two-thirds, or nine-tenths, or nineteen-twentieths of the States could take away institutions existing in the States, the control over which had never been delegated to the General Government, and to interfere with which the Federal Government can find no warrant in the organic law. I do submit that in time of peace, in times when passion did not hold sway, but reason exercised its functions, it would be difficult to find a man in this country who would hold to the doctrine that, under the terms of the organic law in the contemplation of those who made it, any number of States have a right to take away the legislative, judicial, or domestic functions of any other States unless those functions were delegated to the General Government.

But, sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] says that he does not believe any constitution can legalize the enslavement of man. I will quote his language:

“I do not believe any Government, democratic or despotic, can rightfully make a single slave, and that which a Government cannot rightfully do it cannot rightfully or legally authorize or even permit its subjects to do. I do not believe that there can be legally such a thing as property in man.”

Let us examine the organic law and the state of society in this country before the Revolution and formation of the Constitution, and I think I can plainly show that slaves were property. It is not our duty to settle the justice or injustice, the policy or impolicy, of slavery. It will not be disputed that before the adoption of the organic law every State had a right to confer on whom it pleased the rights and privileges of citizens, and it cannot be successfully denied that property in the African race was then sustained by law, and it will not be denied by any lawyer that the several States never surrendered these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Will any man then pretend that the provisions of the organic act in relation to the personal rights to which a citizen of the State was entitled included the negro African race at that time here, or who should afterward be imported? Every person who was a citizen and recognized as such in the several States became also a citizen of the Union, but none other. It was framed by them and for them and their posterity, but for no one else; and the personal rights guaranteed to citizens of the Union were intended to embrace those only who were then members of States according to the provisions of the organic law and the doctrines on which it was founded.

Who were citizens of the several States under the governments of the thirteen colonies when they separated from Great Britain and took their places as an independent nation? Who were the citizens whose liberties had been violated by the mother country, and who declared their independence and determined to defend their rights by force of arms? Neither the persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had then become free or not, were then included in the general words of the Declaration of Independence or acknowledged as a part of the people. They had for more than a century before been regarded as an inferior race and not fit to associate with whites, socially or politically; that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for the benefit of the white race; he was bought and sold like any other article of merchandise. It was an established axiom in morals and politics which no one disputed, and which was not considered open to dispute; and no nation more uniformly acted upon it than the English Government. They seized them on the coast of Africa and sold and held them for their own use, and were more engaged in this commerce than any other nation in the world; and the opinion and practice of England naturally impressed themselves upon the American colonies, and every one of the thirteen colonies bought and sold them as such. Not one of that race had then migrated to this country voluntarily, but had been brought here as merchandise; and slavery existed in every State save one at the adoption of the Constitution, at which time there was no Government of the United States in existence with special, enumerated, and limited powers. Not only did slavery lawfully exist before the formation of the organic law, but it is expressly recognized by the Constitution. Representatives and direct taxes are in part apportioned by the number of slaves:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such a manner as they shall by law direct."—Article 1, section 2.

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."—Article 1, section 9.

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."—Article 4, section 2.

Now, it does seem to me that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated Dred Scott case, although not upon this particular point, yet goes clearly to show that there is no authority, by amending the Constitution of the country, to interfere with rights of the States which never were delegated to the General Government. I will read a part of the judgment of the court in the case, as well to show that slavery cannot be abolished in this way, as for the purpose of showing that it is a well-settled principle of law, which can hardly be denied by any living man, that slaves are held as goods and chattels, and can be bought and sold like any other property.

But it is proclaimed that because the Declaration of Independence declares that all men are born equal, having certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, it never was intended that slavery should exist lawfully. I presume that no right-minded man will pretend that the framers of the Declaration of Independence, when they said that all men were born equal and had certain inalienable rights, intended to include slaves, because slaves at that time never had held any political rights. Slaves had been held here long before the formation of the Constitution; the institution had been transmitted by England and other European nations to the colonies here; slaves were treated here as property liable to be bought and sold, and not as citizens within the meaning of the Declaration of Independence or of the original laws of the country. I will now read from the Dred Scott decision, 19 Howard, page 410:

"It then proceeds to say, 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among them is life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, Governments are instituted, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.'"

"The general words above quoted would seem to embrace the whole human family, and if they were used in a similar instrument at this day would be so understood. But it is too clear for dispute, that the enslaved African race were not intended to be included, and formed no part of the people who framed and adopted this Declaration; for if the language, as understood in that day, would embrace them, the conduct of the distinguished men who framed the Declaration of Independence would have been utterly and flagrantly inconsistent with the principles they asserted; and instead of the sympathy of mankind, to which they so confidently appealed, they would have deserved and received universal rebuke and reprobation."

"Yet the men who framed this Declaration were great men, high in literary acquirements, high in their sense of honor, and incapable of asserting principles inconsistent with those on which they were acting. They perfectly understood the meaning of the language they used, and how it would be understood by others; and they knew that it would not in any part of the civilized world be supposed to embrace the negro race, which, by common consent, had been excluded from civilized government, and the family of nations, and doomed to slavery; they spoke and acted according to the then established doctrines and principles, and in the ordinary language of the day, and no one misunderstood them. The unhappy black race were separated from the white by indelible marks and laws long before established, and were never thought of or spoken of except as property, and when the claims of the owner or the profit of the trader were supposed to need protection."

"This state of public opinion had undergone no change when the Constitution was adopted, as is equally evident from its provisions and language."

"The powers over person and property of which we speak are not only not granted to Congress, but are in express terms denied, and they are forbidden to exercise them. And this prohibition is not confined to the States, but the words are general, and extend to the whole territory over which the Constitution gives it power to legislate, including those portions of it remaining under territorial government as well as that covered by States. It is a total absence of power everywhere within the dominion of the United States, and places the citizens of a Territory, so far as these rights are concerned, on the same footing with citizens of the States, and guards them as firmly and plainly against any inroads which the General Government might attempt under the plea of implied or incidental powers. And if Congress itself cannot do this, if it is beyond the powers conferred on the General Government, it will be admitted, we presume, that it could not authorize a territorial government to exercise them. It could confer no power on any local government established by its authority to violate the provisions of the Constitution."

"It seems, however, to be supposed that there is a difference between property in a slave and other property, and that different rules may be applied to it in expounding the Constitution of the United States. And the laws and usages of nations and the writings of eminent jurists upon the relation of master and slave and their mutual rights and duties, and the powers which Governments may exercise over it, have been dwelt upon in the argument."

"But in considering the question before us, it must be borne in mind that there is no law of nations standing between the people of the United States and their Government and interfering with their relation to each other. The powers of the Government, and the rights of the citizen under it, are positive and practical regulations plainly written down. The people of the United States have delegated to it certain enumerated powers, and forbidden it to exercise others. It has no power over the person or property of a citizen but what the citizens of the United States have granted. And no laws or usages of other nations, or reasoning of statesmen or jurists upon the relations of master and slave, can enlarge the powers of the Government, or take from the citizens the rights they have reserved. And if the Constitution recognizes the right of property of the master in a slave, and makes no distinction between that description of property and other property owned by a citizen, no tribunal acting under the authority of the United States, whether it be legislative, executive, or judicial, has a right to draw such a distinction, or deny to it the benefit of the provisions and guarantees which have been provided for the protection of private property against the encroachments of the Government."

"Now, as we have already said in an earlier part of this opinion, upon a different point, the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution. The right to traffic in it like an ordinary article of merchandise and property was guaranteed to the citizens of the United States, in every State that might desire it, for twenty years. And the Government in express terms is pledged to protect it in all future time if the slave escapes from his owner. This is done in plain words, too plain to be misunderstood. And no word can be found in the Constitution which gives Congress a greater power over slave property, or which entitles property of that kind to less protection, than property of any other description. The only power conferred is the power coupled with the duty of guarding and protecting the owner in his rights."

"Upon these considerations, it is the opinion of the court that the act of Congress which prohibited a citizen from holding and owning property of this kind in the territory of the United States north of the line therein mentioned, is not warranted by the Constitution, and is therefore void; and that neither Dred Scott himself, nor any of his family, were made free by being carried into this territory; even if they had been carried there by the owner with the intention of becoming a permanent resident."

I take the ground, sir, that is taken in this decision, that it is beyond the power of the Federal Government, not only beyond the power of Congress, not only beyond the power of those who may sit here as the Representatives of the people to act and legislate for them, but that it is beyond the power of the constituted authorities of America, of the people in their sovereign capacity, by any amendment of the Constitution to interfere with an institution that belongs solely and exclusively to the jurisdiction of an individual State, without the consent of that State. And I ask what safety there would be in a Republic like this if three fourths of the States could deprive the other fourth of those rights, jurisdiction over which was not delegated by the States to the General Government? Would not the whole framework of the Government be thereby overthrown? And would not despotism and tyranny, in times of war and excitement, prevail over the land in bold and undisturbed impunity? Would it not be a recognition of the authority of three fourths of the States to trample upon those rights and liberties transmitted to us by our noble ancestors who fought side by side together, and handed them down to you and me to protect our lives and property from the influences of despotism and tyranny?

I submit that the proposition on its very face is too absurd to deserve consideration in a republican Government. Can it be that those intelligent and patriotic men who established the independence of the Government, and who battled for their liberties till the soil of our country was marked with their blood from hill to hill, and from plain to plain, intended that the life of freedom breathed into their nostrils might be crushed out by the tyranny or partisan passions of Congress, or of three fourths of the States, and that a minority of the States might be treated as conquered provinces? It is a doctrine which would reduce American freemen to the grade of Russian serfs.

There are lawyers on the other side of the House who know the general rules governing the construction of statutes, contracts, and constitutions. They know that we must construe the Constitution according to the reason and the spirit of it. We must consider what animated the minds of the people and of the delegates who framed it. What were the object and intention of the framers of it? Was it their intention that after going through that vast scene of blood, after such an exhibition of patriotism as the world had never seen, those rights for which they had fought and won, to protect their liberties, their properties, and their households, might be torn from their descendants by the vote of three fourths of the States, against the plain principles for which they fought? Did they ever intend that a two-third vote in Congress, and three fourths of the States, could take from the fourth of the States certain institutions which were guaranteed to them as much as my property was guaranteed to me, or our fathers' or grandfathers' property guaranteed to them by the success of the Revolution, and by the organic law of the land.

It is dangerous, in the present state of the country, to undertake to trample on the precious landmarks of the Constitution. We have been taught to believe that it is the barrier by which the tides of despotism and tyranny are to be kept back. It is only by upholding that barrier that our citizens can escape the evils of that unconstitutional desolation of the country, the evils of this terrible unprovoked war, for which a portion of the people of the North are more accountable than the people of the South. In these times of excitement, when private rights are so much trampled on, it is dangerous to trifle with the sacred landmarks which the wisdom of Washington, of Jefferson, and of the great statesmen and heroes of the Revolution had established in our land as principles to be handed down to us, and to secure ourselves and posterity from the wickedness of unscrupulous tyrants.

But, says the gentleman from Ohio, slavery is the cause of the war. Sir, slavery is not the cause of the war any more than were seamen the cause of the war of 1812. The war of 1812 with Great Britain was because she interfered with our seamen; and the same argument might have been made then that is made now in regard to slavery—that seamen were the cause of the war, and that if we had not had seamen we would not have had war. I tell you, sir, that it was the interference with the rights of American seamen on the part of Great Britain that caused the war. It was not because there were seamen, but because the rights which the Government of this country guaranteed to and threw around them were invaded by Great Britain, and they were taken from the decks of our ships, the soil of America, and forced into the service of a nation hostile to us. Great Britain, by her acts, caused that war.

The history of our country will, in pages red with blood, record that this war was caused by the acts of the abolitionists of the North; of those men who interfered with the institutions of the South. Those men are responsible for all this bloodshed which is now wetting American soil, and causing the earth to groan beneath the deadly weight of the commingled bones of our brethren. I charge here to-day that this interference with slavery has alone severed our glorious Union; blighted our national prosperity; wrecked our civil and political liberty; studded our country with the graves of noble soldiers; caused a hundred fields to weep with brothers' blood; and the screams of wives and mothers to emanate from domestic circles at the ghastly appearance of a tyrant's assassin dragging from the death-bed of a wife or the grave of a child the husband and father, to be incarcerated in a dungeon or cell. I implore you, in the name of truth, do not charge upon slavery the cause of this war. By the history of this country I charge that such men as Wendell Phillips, Horace Greeley, Lloyd Garrison, and those in power, have been the promoters of this war, and the blood of this nation rests upon them. Thank God, I am free from it.

And there is another consideration which I would urge—one of still greater moment—one which stirs the heart of this nation, and which I trust will yet bring back the glory of the American people. I urge that at this time it is not patriotic to urge such a measure as this. It tends to distract the country; it embitters all the elements of social life; it separates the ties of religious brotherhood, and weakens those great principles for which this Government was founded, and for which the blood of the people both of the North and the South was so freely poured out.

I see before me patriotic men from the State of Kentucky; the State which has stood between the ire of the North and the ire of the South; a State that has been true to the Constitution; whose sons here represent the principles ever held by that great statesman Henry Clay; a State that stands by the landmarks of the organic law of the land as the only palladium of our civil liberty. In the name of God, is it justice, is it magnanimity, is it in accordance with that injunction of Scripture, "Do unto others as ye would have others do unto you," to strip from those men the valuable rights of property which were considered sacred until this civil war raised its hydra head? Is it just and right to take away from those men now, after they have for three years and a half interposed their State for the protection of our firesides and our families, to take away their property without any compensation? By what right do we propose to take away this property without paying for it? The Constitution says that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Now, if we regard all the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, by what right do we propose to take away the property of the loyal men of Delaware, Kentucky, and other States, without just compensation?

Nearly every man, if not all of them, in the Convention who framed the Constitution of the United States were slaveholders; that the Constitution of the United States not only recognizes the right of the States to hold this institution, not only allowed them to continue to hold it and not give it up to the General Government, but that Convention, comprising these wise and patriotic statesmen, expressly fortified and sustained it. They not only declared that slavery existed, but that the importation of slaves should not be interfered with until a time named in the Constitution, and they put a provision in the Constitution that no amendment should be made to it which should interfere in any manner with the right to import slaves from foreign countries until the year 1808, and out of which trade Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and other States made money until that year. Why will you regard other prohibitions contained in the Constitution, if you are to pay no regard to those prohibitions and guarantees which relate to this institution?

The power to interfere with the importation of slaves into this country was delegated; but it was provided that it should not be exercised until the year 1808. The Constitution can be amended in that respect, because by the organic law the power to make such an amendment after the year 1808 was expressly granted; it was made one of the ligaments which interwove the different parts of the Constitution together. Because that was made a part of the organic law of the land, and for that reason alone, the Federal Government, by two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the State Legislatures, representing the people who made that Constitution, has the right to make such an amendment. Why? Because that is an amendment contemplated by the organic act; it is an amendment within the purview of the powers delegated to the General Government; it is an amendment in relation to a question the control of which is not reserved to the States; it is an amendment which the General Government was expressly authorized to make. It was provided by the Constitution that until the year 1808 the importation of slaves should not be interfered with by the General Government, but that after that date Congress might make any law they deemed proper in regard to that matter.

No man, though he search till the end of time, can show me an instance in which an amendment has been allowed which did not come within the plain letter or the spirit of the Constitution. Examine, if you choose, the amendments which were adopted after the Constitution had been ratified, and the Government established. Those amendments, which were adopted by the people because they apprehended that their personal rights, their life, liberty, or property which they had fought to maintain during the mighty strife of the Revolution might be invaded, were germane to the Constitution itself. You will find none but such as came within the powers delegated to the General Government, either by the spirit or the letter of the Constitution. For, sir, the Constitution is to be interpreted, not only by its letter, but, like all other laws, by its spirit, and the object had in view by its framers when they made it, which object was to preserve the rights of themselves and their posterity for all time to come.

Another evidence that it never was intended that three fourths of the States should have the power, through the process of amendments, to interfere with the domestic policy and internal concerns of the other States, is found in the fact that no such authority is in the organic law. Every gentleman here knows perfectly well that in the Convention by which the Constitution was framed attempts were made to give the General Government power to interfere with the institution of slavery. But all propositions of that kind were rejected. Sir, the Constitution would never have been framed, the wise principles of our fathers would never have been embodied in the General Government, the flag of this country would never have waved in triumph from the dome of this Capitol over this degenerate race but for the fact that our fathers saw, when such propositions to interfere with the domestic institutions of the States were voted down, that the rights for which they had fought, and which had been embodied in the organic law of the States, should never be trampled upon by the tyranny or despotism of fanatical power. The right to maintain the institution of slavery was reserved to the respective States. If you examine the Constitution to arrive at the meaning of its framers, you will find that by that organic law certain rights were expressly prohibited to the States—among others, the right to coin money, make treaties, grant letters of marque and reprisal, &c.

Why were those prohibitions expressly inserted, if it was believed that powers were delegated to the General Government when no express language to that effect was used? Do I make myself understood? I ask, why did the Convention which framed the Constitution declare in that instrument that certain powers should not be exercised by the States? It was because those powers were intended to be exclusively delegated to the General Government; because it was the design to endow that Government with the exclusive control of those subjects, and because it was provided in another part of that instrument that "the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Thus was exhibited the object of the framers of the Constitution; that they intended to guard State lines; that they were not willing that their children, to whom this Government should descend, should be deprived of the benefit of those immutable principles of American liberty for the defense of which they had resisted and defied the power of Great Britain. Guided by an almost superhuman foresight, those who framed the Constitution stamped indelibly the landmarks for our guidance; and among the most vital principles which they sought to preserve was the right of the respective States to the control of their own domestic institutions. If slavery can be abolished by an amendment of the organic law in States where it exists, without their consent, then by the same process can slavery be established in States where it does not exist, and against their consent, if three quarters of the States so decide. Was a doctrine so monstrous ever contemplated by the illustrious dead who framed the organic law? Yet such was the case, if one fourth of the States can be deprived of their slave property by the action of the other three fourths.

Why, gentlemen, where are we to land if such a constitutional amendment as is now proposed be lawful? Look at the declaration of the platform adopted at Baltimore, the platform upon which Mr. Lincoln received the suffrages of a majority of the American people. That platform declares that slavery is the cause of the war, and that the preservation of the national life demands its complete extermination; and on that ground it approves, as coming within the powers of the Constitution, the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln abolishing slavery. If Mr. Lincoln, by the spirit and meaning of the Constitution, was justified in issuing that proclamation, and if it was so far valid as to confiscate property in slaves, what is the necessity for this amendment to the Constitution? If that proclamation abolishing slavery is the law of the land, as declared by a large portion of the people through their representatives at Baltimore, when they emphatically proclaimed to the world, and asked the suffrages of the American people upon the announcement, that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation was a death-blow to the institution of slavery and was warranted by the Constitution, why ask this legislation? Ah, gentlemen, it shows to you and it shows to me the danger of all such interferences. It shows that in the same way you may by an amendment to the Constitution declare the right of trial by jury abolished; that the right of freedom from unreasonable searches shall no longer remain; and that that article which declares that no man shall be deprived of his life, liberty, and property without due process of law, may also be taken away. In like way by an amendment to the Constitution you may establish an oligarchy, a despotism, or a monarchy upon the ruins of this Republic.

I have no doubt I will be told that this is rebellious talk, and that it tends to aid and comfort the rebels. I avow here that it is my conviction we have more to fear that our rights and liberties and property will be taken away by the despotic usurpations of the abolition party than from the acts of Jeff. Davis or the confederate government, and I am here to-day to enter my protest against the high-handed acts of the Administration. Although I have not heretofore taken up much time of the House by the discussion of these topics, still I have not ceased to enter my protest against those acts to which I have referred. I protest against them as a citizen of the United States, and as a citizen of the gallant State of New Jersey, which has clung to the Constitution of the United States as the ligament of the Union, a State whose brave sons in thousands have gone from her hills and her valleys and laid down their lives a willing sacrifice for their country; a State which has always been true to the Constitution and the Union, and which, I thank God, has never yet cast her vote in favor of the wild fanaticism of abolition which has run riot all over this land.

I have already shown that the organic law provides that taxation and representation of the country shall in part depend upon the number of slaves. In other words, it is declared that slaves shall constitute a part of the population which is to be represented in Congress. If this amendment be passed, that portion of the Constitution will still remain. If I understand correctly, there is no intention on the part of this Congress to interfere with that portion of the Constitution. The Constitution, then, will provide that taxation and representation shall be according to a certain number of these slaves. You make no provision for making these emancipated slaves citizens of the United States, or giving them any power in the sovereignty of a State. You do not change their political condition. How then can they be represented as provided by the Constitution? What a strange anomaly shall we then have—the Constitution providing that they shall be represented when they are not really represented! If this be passed I tell you that it will be the last act in the dissolution of the Union, for the southern people can never be expected to come back and with bended knees bow down to the imperial dignity of this Administration as serfs and slaves.

I want the Union restored. I want the Union as it was made for us by our fathers. I want the Union which was made by the patriots, the statesmen, the brave men of the times that tried men's souls. I want the Union which protects the liberties of white men and women. I want the Union that has given us peace and prosperity and grandeur such as never before belonged to any nation in the world. But I tell you that we can only have such a Union by adhering to the immutable rights of all the States. The Union is the only condition of peace; we ask no more. If you love the Union as much as I do, if you want the Union restored, let it be known that it shall be restored with all the rights and privileges that came down to us from our ancestors. I repeat what General McClellan said, "The Union is the one condition of peace; we ask no more." We want to preserve the blood of this nation. We love our country, and we cannot afford to make war upon the people of one section for the purpose of carrying out any frenzy or false philanthropy of those who have undertaken to recognize that doctrine.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. PRUYN, who said: I wish simply to make a statement to the House with reference to this question, without entering into a discussion of its merits.

When this subject came up at the last session, I stated my views somewhat at length in regard to it. My position then was substantially that under the power to amend the Constitution we could not interfere with or take away the reserved rights of the States. I do not now propose to discuss the subject of slavery in any way; I did not then. I look upon the question before us simply as one of power, and it is immaterial in this view whether it relates to slavery, to the marital relation, to the laws of descent, or to any other of the subjects over which the State governments have entire control. I then remarked that if gentlemen would look at the debates of the State conventions which passed upon the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, they would clearly see that that instrument would never have been ratified had it been supposed by the States that under the power to amend their reserved rights might one by one be swept away. This is the first time in our history in which an attempt of this kind has been made, and should it be successful it will, in my judgment, be an alarming invasion of the principles of the Constitution.

I have only to say in addition, that further investigation has confirmed the views I before expressed, and I cannot therefore vote in favor of this proposition, believing the subject to be one not legitimately within our jurisdiction. If it be asked what then can be done, I answer, leave the matter with the States, where it belongs, or obtain a supplementary article to the Constitution, not as an amendment, but as the grant of a new power based on the consent of all the States, as the Constitution itself is.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to trespass upon the time of this House during the discussion of this bill, but I have heard from the lips of two or three gentlemen whose views have been expressed here sentiments which are not in accordance with my own, and I think it due to myself and to my constituents that I should place upon record the sentiments which will control my action and determine my vote. Having lived more than half a century, I have never, until this morning understood to its full and perfect extent the definition of civil liberty. I find, by the commentary of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] that civil liberty consists in the right of one people to enslave another people to whom nature has given equal rights of freedom. Sir, civil liberty, in my judgment, has no such interpretation, no such meaning; and no man who regards himself as made in the image of his Maker, solely responsible to his Maker for his thoughts and actions, can recognize a sentiment which lowers him in his own estimation, in the estimation of Heaven, and before the face of the whole world. Nature made all men free, and entitled them to equal rights before the law; and this Government of ours must stand upon this principle, which, sooner or later, will be recognized throughout the civilized world.

But we are told, while asserting this principle of legal or civil equality, that we are violating the fundamental principle of the Constitution under which we live, by the measure now under consideration. I can see no such violation, and even if there were a technical violence done to the letter of the Constitution I should hold it defensible for the purpose of preserving the life and the power of the Republic which our fathers framed for the perpetuation of civil liberty.

As I understand it, our Constitution was framed and the Government organized for the purpose of perpetuating the blessings of liberty to all in present and in future times. That Constitution provided the mode of its amendment, and the power of amendment was restricted in two points alone: The one was in reference to the importation of "persons" or slaves, before the year 1808; and the other was in restriction of the power of the people to reduce the senatorial representation of any State without its consent; all else was left to the future determination and judgment of the people of the United States, as a united, aggregate, and sovereign nation.

What powers, sir, were in the purview of those who framed the Constitution and of those by whose votes it was adopted? If gentlemen will rise from the narrow and restricted interpretation of the text to the magnificence of the exordium by which our fathers in that Constitution announced the formation of a republican Government founded on the principles of equality and justice, they will find that the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity, ordained and established our Constitution and the Government of the Union. These were the great and cardinal purposes for which the Government was framed. Liberty, that civil and religious liberty which was so clearly and beautifully defined in the Declaration of Independence, and which, in the language of that Declaration, had been proclaimed to the world as the inalienable inheritance of every man, gave vitality to the Constitution and the Government which by it was called into life. The unfortunate restriction which then existed in our land upon universal freedom, in the form of African slavery, was regarded as temporary in its character and as tolerable only by reason of the exigencies of the hour. Our fathers predicted that the time would soon come when the interests of the country would demand that slavery should pass away. Jefferson predicted it, Washington prayed for it, and all the great men of that great age believed that the stain of African slavery would soon cease from the land.

But, sir, as years rolled on, slavery, once regarded as a crime and a curse, became to the South a profitable institution. The acquisition of new territories adapted to slave labor, and the increased value of cotton arising from the invention of Whitney, have rendered it for the interest of the South to maintain slave labor which capital might own and which avarice might control. Interest, individual interest, bound up in the "almighty dollar," has lent its support to an institution which in its origin was forced upon an unwilling people by the imperial power and cupidity of England; and upon that institution has grown up a caste, an aristocracy, based upon the ownership of labor, of sinews, bones, and blood, entirely inconsistent with republican government and republican institutions. It is this power thus grafted upon and maintained by slavery which has undertaken to overthrow this Government.
